GOODS EXCHANGE DAYS

June 12 and 13

Give your trash a chance.

It's easy to participate, fun to browse for goods you may want and a great way to reduce and reuse goods otherwise destined for landfill.

- On the week-end of June 12 and 13, between 9 am and 5 pm (each day), place unwanted goods out on your own property. Make sure not to obstruct traffic and please remove doors from all large appliances.
- To avoid confusion, keep any goods not free for the taking separate.
- Try locating a charitable organization for any goods that may be left over after the event.
- All goods should be removed at the end of each day and only placed out for garbage collection on your regular garbage day. There will be no special garbage collection for leftover goods.

Questions? Call your participating municipality.

Students pay departure tax

by Hana Ahmad
Charlatan Staff

Students who want to graduate in convocation ceremonies will have to fork over $30 starting this November.

Fall convocation was cancelled at the end of March by university administrators as a cost-saving measure. The university would have saved $40,000 by cancelling the ceremony.

In early May, Carleton President Robin Farquhar decided to reinstate the fall ceremony. Students graduating will now have to pay a $30 "participation charge" to take part in convocation ceremonies.

The $30 levy will help pay for gowns, chair rentals and post-graduation receptions. The charge will not be in effect for this spring's convocation, but will be applied for all other ceremonies.

Public relations director Pat O'Brien says costs not covered by the $30 levy will be paid for out of the university's convocation budget. The amount paid for by the levy will depend on how many people participate in the ceremony.

Many students expressed discontent after convocation was cancelled, including student representatives on the Board of Governors, the Graduate Students' Association and CUSA, the undergraduate students' association.

CUSA circulated a petition "to show the students' disappointment with the cancellation of convocation," says Gary Anandasangaree, CUSA's director of academics. The petition, which received hundreds of signatures, was not sent to Farquhar, because administration had already agreed to reinstate the fall ceremony.

The one major expense of fall convocation is renting the National Arts Centre, says Don McEown, Farquhar's executive assistant. It costs more to rent the National Arts Centre, which is "very expensive but necessary as it is too cold to hold the event outside and it's too big for the gym," says McEown. Spring convocation is held on the lawn outside the administration building.

The total cost of fall convocation, which includes renting the NAC, setting up and tearing down the stage, renting gowns and producing programs, is about $40,000.

Professor Michel Gaulin, clerk of the university Senate, says student resistance to the cancellation wasn't anticipated, since "only half of students who get their degrees actually attend (the ceremony) and a number of universities have already eliminated the ceremonies due to the costs involved."

O'Brien says between 1,300 and 1,500 students graduate every fall. Of those, only 700 or 800 attend the fall ceremonies in the morning or afternoon.

McEown says charging students for their convocation ceremony is not new — it happened in ceremonies from the mid '70s up until 1983 or 1984. He says students then were charged $15 — just enough to cover the cost of their gown rental.

O'Brien says the fee is "an example of the difficult financial times the university finds itself in."

"It was not something the university wanted to do but it was the most fair way to try and reduce expenditures while continuing to provide the ceremony for those who want to attend."

Anandasangaree says he's "nothappy with the fact that they are charging us for graduation in addition to four or five years of tuition and books."

"Administration is charging us for everything. The least we can have is a free graduation. But if this is our only option to bring back graduation, it's something we have to live with." □

Capital Foods raises prices and ire

by Renata Manchak
Charlatan Staff

Food prices at all campus cafeterias run by Capital Food Services went up May 1, leaving some customers with a bitter taste in their mouths.

Prices were increased in the Peppermill, Loeb Café, the Fit Stop, Hugo's, the Bent Coin in the administration building, Mr. Sub and the tunnel snack bar near Paterson Hall.

Jim Johnston, associate director of Housing and Food Services, says a notice was posted at all Capital Foods outlets on campus in the first week of May.

The notice said "overall prices on most items would be kept to less than three per cent," says Johnston.

But some customers were angry that not all prices went up uniformly by three per cent.

An anonymous letter posted on the Peppermill's feedback board in early May accused Capital Foods of raising prices much higher than the promised three per cent.

For example, the letter says a two-egg breakfast with bacon used to cost $2.85. Under the new price system, it costs $3.45 — an increase of more than 20 per cent. Peppermill manager Colleen Bird says this is because eggs went up 15 cents each, an increase of 50 per cent.

Bird says the three per cent figure is an average increase.

"You have to realize that the figure came from averaging out the increases, the decreases and the constant prices," Bird says.

"You have to take into account that many of the items remained constant," she says. "Breakfast was where most of the increases occurred and we decreased the prices of deli toppings."

"We've kept all the steam table items, which are the meals such as lasagna, at the same price because we believe that they are important to the diet of our customers," says Johnston.

The letter criticized Capital Foods not only for their increase, but for "taking advantage of their captive student market."

Capital Foods' contract with Housing and Food Services gives them a monopoly on all student eateries outside of the campus residences until the year 2001.

"I think the price of food on campus is too high already," says Lucy Watson, president of the undergraduate students' association. "The students are already being taken advantage of enough without having to pay more." Watson says the association has no plans to try and set up a student-run cafeteria.

"We know we have a captive audience," says Bird, "but we have a contract with (Housing and Food Services) to run these restaurants."

Bird received five anonymous letters complaining about the price increases, three of which appeared to have been written by the same person.

Buddy, can you spare three bucks for a cup of coffee?

Johnston says Capital Foods raises its prices May 1 every year. Last year's increase was between four and five per cent, he says.

"Most students neglect to take into consideration the costs that we have to face: payroll, purchasing, overhead. The money has to come from somewhere," says Johnston.

Theft is another cost, says Bird. "I'll order cutlery and before the order is paid for I have to order more," she says.

Johnston agrees theft keeps prices high. "I'm sure between Marriott (the corporation that operates residence cafeterias) and Capital Foods, they supply cutlery and china to quite a few apartments in Ottawa." □

Library to improve accessibility

by Josée Bellemare
Charlatan Staff

A new elevator should make Carleton's library more accessible for people with disabilities.

The elevator will provide direct access to the library's main floor from the tunnel.

The elevator used now is located at the staff entrance to the library on the tunnel level, where deliveries are also received. A person who wants to use the elevator has to ring a bell and wait for someone to come down and unlock it.

Construction of the elevator is slated to start in the middle of June but it won't be operational until December.

The project will cost $450,000. The money to pay for the project will come in part from the Challenge Fund, which was set up to improve accessibility on campus for people with disabilities. The remainder comes from the university's capital budget, says Tom Novosedlik, project co-ordinator for Construction Services.

Use of the new elevator will not be reserved for students with disabilities alone.

"We don't want to create a special condition where only handicapped people can use it," Novosedlik says.

He says there won't be any signs saying priority should be given to people who use wheelchairs who want to use the elevator.

Novosedlik says a new ramp will also be built around the elevator outside the main doors of the library, because the present ramp is too steep for a person who uses a wheelchair.

Linda Rossman, associate librarian for information services, says the elevator has been in the works for at least a year.

Novosedlik says the wait for the new elevator was caused by an absence of funding, as well as planning discussions with university administrators.

Larry McCloskey, director of the Paul Menton Centre for Persons with Disabilities, says the question of library access has been a concern since 1981.

"(Library access) is the biggest physical access issue on campus," he says.

Janet Burrows, co-ordinator of Carleton's Disability Awareness Centre, says some students find the library very inaccessible.

"They have to keep on ringing until someone lets them upstairs," she says.

McCloskey says he thinks library staff are "very good" in responding quickly when a student rings the bell.

But he says students' current reliance on staff for access to a building means people with disabilities cannot be fully integrated into university life as independent individuals.

McCloskey says Carleton's reputation as an accessible university could be improved from a greater commitment to a "barrier-free design," meaning a fully accessible plan for campus.

A year-long study by Physical Plant and the Paul Menton Centre estimated the cost of making Carleton barrier-free would be $5 million, as compared to $50 million at the University of Toronto, says McCloskey.

Novosedlik says the main entrance of the library will be closed for a short period at the end of June, and construction will continue until the beginning of September. □

The signs they are a'changin'

by Arn Keeling and Sean Silcoff
Charlatan Staff

Feelings of frustration and confusion among visitors to campus may soon be a thing of the past once Carleton finishes installing a new sign system.

The $133,000 project, which will be fully operational within a few weeks, will replace Carleton's antiquated and user-unfriendly wooden signs with a system of coordinated, easy-to-follow directional signs.

The system is divided into three levels: 10 road signs with directions to parking lots and buildings; 19 pathway signs with maps and directions to buildings; and six parking lot signs, which identify public access parking lots and the buildings closest to them.

The new signs were developed with ease of use and maintenance in mind, says Tom Novosedlik, project co-ordinator for Construction Services.

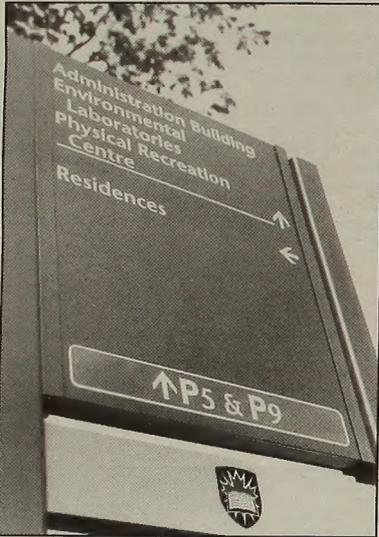

"Most people I've talked to say it takes a while to get used to campus. The new system will take care of that," says Novosedlik.

He says the white-on-green signs are easy to maintain and repair, since they are built with standard sizes of aluminum and steel.

The sign plates slide into slots and lock in place on the signposts, which resemble football goalposts. In case of damage or changes, the signs can be easily removed and replaced.

Isabelle Roberts, an applicant to Carleton visiting for a day, said she and her two friends found the campus layout confusing. But she said the sign she used was "more or less" effective.

One of the brand, spankin' new signs.

"It told us where we want to go," she said.

The project was in the planning stages for five years before it was approved in December 1992, says Novosedlik. The Design Workshop, a local firm, was hired to design and construct the system.

"A lot of questions had to be answered before we knew what kind of signage we wanted. Since it involves the whole campus, we had to decide what the campus wanted to be," says Novosedlik.

A committee comprised of students, staff and administrators provided input for the system, which gets its trial run during the Learned Societies Conference, starting May 30.

Brenda Kennedy, Carleton Foot Patrol co-ordinator, says the patrol had no direct input into the design or placement of the new signs.

However, she says signs are important to campus safety for visitors, who may risk attack if they are confused about directions on campus.

"It's definitely an improvement (on the old signs)," says Kennedy. "The more signs the better."

Kennedy says the sign outside the Unicentre near the bus stop seems attractive and clearly marked, which is important for safety considerations.

"I could tell there was a map, which is good," she says.

However, she says it remains to be seen how effective the signs will be at night and after weathering an Ottawa winter. The signs do not light up at night.

This project is the first part of a two-phase system. The next phase will see signs directing people in and around different buildings, says Novosedlik. □

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Editor:

Your writer Angelia Wagner managed to get just about everything wrong in her article ("Committee inactive on 2,4-D issue," The Charlatan, April 1, 1993).

First, the Turf Management Committee's mandate is to conduct an alternative organic lawn care program on an area of the administration lawn around the fountain. Also, she misquoted both Jane Beauchamp and Connor Boegel of OPIRG-Carleton. While they both expressed some concern that they had not yet heard when the Turf Management Committee (TMC) was meeting, they both told her they think the committee is a positive first step in eliminating synthetic chemical pesticides, herbicides and fertilizers on campus.

With regard to the moratorium on the use of 2,4-D, the memo we received from Spruce Kiordon on Nov. 18, 1993 states:

"Selective use of herbicides on playing fields will be considered in 1993 if necessary as a matter of player safety, as determined by the Vice-President (Finance and Administration) on the advice of the Director of Athletics." The TMC had its first meeting on April 7. Administration officials at that meeting stated there would be no spraying of the playing fields this year but that the use of 2,4-D would continue as necessary. However, Keith Harris, Director of Athletics, expressed his willingness to explore alternatives to the use of pesticides if these would produce a satisfactory playing surface. We at OPIRG are encouraged by the positive attitude of the committee members to alternative methods of lawn maintenance.

New university builds on optimism

by Arn Keeling
Charlatan Staff

PRINCE GEORGE, B.C. — When I arrived for the public information session for UNBC, the administrators had forgotten the key to the building, so they held it on the grass in a nearby park.

This is a university?
It is, in fact, Canada's newest: the University of Northern British Columbia. And despite a rocky first year, the first entirely new university in Canada in 25 years is shaping up to be a legitimate educational destination for both students and faculty.

If enthusiasm and optimism count, UNBC may overcome the challenge of building a modern university from the ground up.

"The university doesn't want to be a glorified college," said UNBC media officer Rob van Adrichem.

Like the university, the 22-year-old van Adrichem is young and enthusiastic. On a tour of the half-built university site on Cranbrook Hill overlooking the city, van Adrichem said the university has earned an early respect from its more established peers in Canada.

"It's got a reputation of being brash and confident," he said.

However, establishing an operational university has not been easy.

UNBC began a "QuickStart" program last year, offering third- and fourth-year courses to students in northern B.C. transferring from colleges. Course offerings were sparse and classes in Prince George were held in a small building used by the French Canadian Club.

The main university site will be completed and full course offerings will be available in September 1994.

Niki Yandeau and Heather Sapergia are part of the first group of UNBC students.

They said the small number of students last year created a close atmosphere among the professors and their classes.

Ken Coates talks to students and the public in a Prince George park.

Only about 70 students attended UNBC courses in 1992-93, so the need for student organizations has not surfaced. To lobby for certain courses or changes to regulations, all the students had to do was ask.

"We sort of got what we wanted," said Sapergia, who found professors and administration responsive to students' suggestions.

However, with about 1,500 students expected to enrol for the official opening of the university in 1994, plans are in the works for a student government. UNBC will be hiring a director of student services, a process that will involve student input.

One challenge the students did face last year was that their textbooks didn't arrive until near the end of the first term.

But despite some problems and very lean course offerings for next year, Yandeau and Sapergia—who are due to graduate in UNBC's first student convocation next year—remain enthusiastic about their school.

"This university's really exciting," said Sapergia. "Very un-stodgy."

With the kind of input the students have had so far in developing the university, it's not surprising to see their excitement.

The public information session in the park, conducted by vice-president academic Ken Coates, was a vision of a university without the bureaucracy.

Coates personally answered questions about the calendar and asked the dozen-or-so students at the session how UNBC could best maintain a strong student voice in university affairs.

Coates told the students he hoped to establish a "student-driven timetable," tailored to meet the time constraints and course interests of students before faculty.

"We're looking for faculty who will accept that," he said.

While swatting mosquitos after the meeting, Coates, a former University of Victoria history professor, said he hopes giving students so much input will attract prominent faculty rather than scare them away.

"I hope it's going to be very innovative," he said.

UNBC received 2,100 applications for only 40 new faculty positions for 1993-94. The applications have already yielded some high profile professors.

The chair of the Natural Resource Management program—an alternative to the traditional "forestry"—was an assistant director with the United States Forest Service.

As well, many other professors lured to formulate programs are young yet have published and won teaching awards, Coates said.

Perhaps its crowning academic achievement thus far has been the granting of a prestigious Fulbright scholarship to an American professor to teach and research at UNBC. Only six such scholarships were awarded to Canadian universities last year.

But a long road still lies ahead for UNBC. The Prince George Citizen reported in March that the first phase of construction for the university buildings came in over budget. The bill was about $8.7 million higher than expected, said van Adrichem.

As well, work has been delayed on the new road up Cranbrook Hill because the hillside began to slip away. The road will open one year behind schedule in September 1995. There is now only one road to the university.

However, many people in the north say the demand for higher education in B.C. should overcome these difficulties. Students who are unable or unwilling to attend the crowded universities in southern B.C. may soon have an opportunity to get a quality education.

According to Niki Yandeau, that was the initial attraction of UNBC for her, and the reason why she has weathered the glitches, the lack of choices and the long, northern winter: "It's close to home." □

Tiny Tories work for Charest and Boyer

by Josée Bellemare and Arn Keeling
Charlatan Staff

Phones are ringing and photocopiers are zooming as Carleton delegates prepare for the Progressive Conservative leadership convention on June 8 in Ottawa.

The Carleton PC Youth Club elected two delegates and two alternates supporting Jean Charest as well as one delegate and one alternate for Patrick Boyer's campaign.

Delegates campaign for leadership candidates and the alternates replace them if they can't show up to the convention.

Don Burton, the delegate supporting Boyer, said he has done everything from driving his candidate to public appearances to phoning youth delegates across the country to pitch the Boyer platform.

Burton said he knows Boyer doesn't have a realistic chance at winning the leadership race because Boyer isn't a cabinet minister and doesn't have a lot of money to spend on a campaign.

"It's more important for him to make sure the issues are brought forward," said Burton.

He said Boyer wants to freeze all government spending for 36 months to reduce the federal deficit. Boyer also supports reinstating the death penalty if public opinion favors it, said Burton.

Serge L'Africain, an alternate for the Charest campaign, said the delegates must be members of a campus PC club before entering the delegate race. The club members choose the delegates first, then the alternates.

There will be about 1,000 youth delegates to the convention out of about 3,700 delegates.

Burton said youth delegates share the same privileges at the convention as others, including voting for the candidates.

"We try to make the right decisions about a leader," he said.

Burton said the leadership campaign has been good exposure for the Conservatives, but he was critical of the press coverage.

"The press doesn't care about issues," he said. "Issues don't sell."

L'Africain said Charest's policies will appeal to students.

"I like his ideas on education, and how he wants to increase tax deductions for schools," he said. "He wants to get people off welfare and back in school."

Despite Kim Campbell's lead in the campaign, L'Africain said he hopes Charest will become the next prime minister of Canada.

"I'm not too sure," he said. "I don't think Kim Campbell will win on the first ballot... I do believe Jean Charest will win."

L'Africain also said Charest's energy is a prime factor.

"He's very energetic, he looks like a born leader," he said. "He's very enthusiastic and he really gives the impression he cares."

Burton also said he thinks Charest will come from behind to win the Tory leadership. □

Jean Charest will have two Carleton delegates with him at the Tory convention.

Chris Aubé

A Do It Yourself (DIY) concert is about an ethic. That ethic is about accessibility, independence and keeping the indie music community alive.

A DIY concert is organized by a local promoter, features bands that probably would not have the chance to play at a commercial venue, and is not done for profit. To keep the show open to people of all ages and incomes, the ticket price is kept as low as possible and the venue is rarely a bar.

On Sunday, May 23, about 80 people paid $8 each to attend an independently organized and promoted concert in the Blue Room at the University of Ottawa. Most people in the audience were under the age of 19.

They came to see a couple of punk rock bands: Black Triangle, a local punk music staple, and MDC, a punk band from California, who have been around since the early-'80s.

The show's organizer, Chris Aubé, is a 21-year-old marshall arts teaching assistant. After the concert, he explained why he is willing to risk losing money to give independent bands a venue.

"The goal of the show is to have kids see bands that they otherwise wouldn't be exposed to. I will only book bands that have something to say to the kids," says Aubé.

"I don't care what type of music it is, as long as they've got some sort of socially or politically conscious message."

While he usually covers his costs, Aubé figures he lost about $300 on the MDC concert due to poor turnout.

He signed a contract with MDC promising $500 for the performance, on top of $200 for the sound system, $90 for the hall and another $200 for promotions.

"If I had wanted to make money, I would have charged $12 at the door," says Aubé.

Sean Thomas, bass player of the local band Lockjaw, also organizes concerts for bands that do not get picked up by commercial concert promoters.

"A lot of bars won't book bands if they're not going to draw a lot of people," says Thomas. "And if it's an out-of-town band who's never played here before they're obviously not going to draw a lot of people."

Thomas, a 21-year-old anthropology student at Carleton, says he has never sought to make money from his shows but covers his costs with pre-sold tickets. He usually pays out-of-town bands 100 per cent of the ticket sales at the door. Local bands get any leftover money from pre-sold tickets.

He says for him DIY is also a reaction to commercial music distributors and concert promoters.

"It's about you having the power on your own, realizing you have control over how you present something," says Thomas.

"You don't wait for anybody to do it for you."

As an example of how one can avoid commercial concert promotion and record distribution, Thomas cites a book called Book Your Own Fucking Life, a listing of independent distributors and DIY promoters in over 50 countries.

"You can even book a show in Brunai," says Thomas.

In order to promote and organize shows in Ottawa, Aubé has set up a phone number (234-PUNK) which lists all the DIY shows over a two-month period. This lets DIY promoters network to help each other out, or at least prevent two shows from competing for the relatively small following on the same night.

The listing service isn't limited to concert listings. It also promotes anti-racist action meetings, political rallies, or "anything that's topical or that would be of concern to the community who come to shows like this," says Aubé.

Yannick Lorrain runs an independent record label, Daybreak Records, and is also the guitarist for the band Confusion. He began organizing shows a year and a half ago "because nobody else was."

Lorrain says he objects to the way major promoters and record labels profit from music.

"I'm really against big distributors. They only do exclusive deals and have price monopolies. They fuck people over - they're scumbags."

Shawn Scallen is the music director at CKCU and co-organizes exclude a group just because they can't or won't drink," says Thomas.

"I don't believe you should be discriminated against because of your age," says Aubé. "Also, it's the whole alcohol and tobacco thing - they use sexist advertising, ecologically it's disastrous, and it induces apathy. Apathy is the thing that fucks the world the most - I would never put on a bar show."

Keith Powell, 23, also organizes shows, and believes that while most people respect an all-ages, no-liquor policy, those who don't hurt the future of independent shows in Ottawa.

"People bringing alcohol in to all-ages shows - I'm really down on that.

Especially at university venues, because it's so easy to get shut down," says Powell.

"I wish people wouldn't do it. Like (my friend) Sid says: 'It's shitting where you eat.' Some insidious bastard like that is responsible for what happened at the SAW Gallery."

According to both Powell and Thomas, a bathroom and an elevator were vandalized during a show at the SAW Gallery last month. The concert's organizer, Lorrain, was stuck with the cost of repairs.

Thomas says now the SAW gallery is more hesitant about renting the space for DIY concerts.

Aubé says incidents like the one at the SAW Gallery happen when people are attracted to the shows because of the "alternative movement," without caring about the principles behind them.

"I think we're caught up in a Lolapalooza-grunge generation thing," says Aubé. "Everybody's got a pair of Docs, but if you want to be reeeally 'cool' you buy a pair of Docs and go to a punk show."

In the meantime, cautious optimism about the independent shows' new popularity marks the attitudes of most organizers.

"Well, it pays the bills," says Lorrain. "But I've often put on my posters: No Nirvana Wanna-be's."

"Kids who were listening to Right Said Fred last year are listening to Nirvana and Rage Against the Machine this year," says Scallen.

"But it's a good thing if, out of 100 people, five to 10 of them pick up on something and maybe get some idea of how fucked up things are and what independent music is all about."

benefit shows with Lockjaw. He first got involved with DIY shows in 1987, when he worked with a music collective which was based out of a club on Rideau Street called One Step Beyond. The collective, which organized independent shows, dissolved about three years ago.

Scallen's inspiration to organize shows came out of a visit to Washington, D.C., where he became acquainted with a music collective called Positive Force.

"They're a group made up of everyone - from high school kids to government officials - who get together to do everything from dishing out food in soup kitchens to organizing punk percussion protests outside the White House. They also put on benefit concerts for needy organizations," says Scallen.

"It's (the idea) that music is for people and not for profit . . . for all ages, for everybody."

Because of this, most DIY concerts are held at less-expensive, unlicensed venues like the SAW Gallery, or Ottawa U's Café Alternatif.

Take the Tory Taste Test

Does anyone remember the new Coke? Every 10 years, it seems cola companies try something different to bring consumers back to their product. Just walk into your local convenience store and sample the new Crystal Pepsi. Eventually though, we always seem to go back to those old familiar tastes. It was about ten years ago now that Coke changed its taste only to bring back Coca-Cola Classic.

Just like cola companies, political parties have also developed the trick of recreating themselves every ten years. Around the same time that new Coke was not the choice of a new generation, a certain Martin Brian Mulroney was chosen the new savior of the Progressive Conservative party.

As "the boy from Baie Comeau," Mulroney promised a grassroots approach to solving unity and economic problems.

But given Canada's situation today, we would have been better off swallowing the new Coke instead of the new leader.

With another Conservative leadership convention approaching, the Tories are reinventing themselves to become the taste of a new generation by promising to "bring the government to the people" and practise the "politics of inclusion."

Part of the Tory old guard — Mulroney, Joe Clark and Benoit Bouchard — is leaving. But will the party change under a new leader?

Both Kim Campbell and Jean Charest have said they have fresh perspectives on the problems of the country to attract Canadians and Conservative delegates.

But look who is advising the campaign of front-runner Kim Campbell: Senator Lowell Murray, Patrick Kinsella and Norm Atkins. All are former Mulroney strategists and advisors. Is Campbell the choice of a new generation of Tories? Of Canadians?

Campbell has defended every Tory policy, good or bad. She has pledged to reduce the deficit, but has spoken very little about how. The changes she has proposed are those of degree, not of direction.

Meanwhile, Charest is touted as a fresh young candidate. But he is no stranger to mud-slinging politics. Charest's campaign made sure journalists covering the leadership race had copies of the infamous Newman article on Campbell, published in Vancouver magazine.

In it Campbell calls people who boast of how they've never been involved in a political party "condescending s.o.b.s." and said she supposed she was confirmed as an Anglican as a way of "warding off the evil demons of the papacy."

So Charest is not as free of corruption as he may want us to believe.

Remember: like the cola wars, leadership races are mostly image. It's obvious Tories are trying to change their image. Less obvious is whether the party's policies will change with the new leader.

One need only look at the last two Tory governments for examples of pre-election hype, followed by post-election indecision. Afraid to do anything rash like real tax reform, yet unable to part with their platform of "deficit reduction," they do nothing, and wait for the next renewal. At this point, the cycle starts over.

The upcoming election is going to be one of the most difficult ones for voters because all parties will spout "holier than thou" rhetoric, blaming the others for the country's problems. It is the obligation of Tory delegates and Canadian voters to look past the labels and the image to the taste.

So pass the orange juice!

A modest proposal to change our economy

by Franco D'Orazio
Charlatan staff

With an unemployment rate of over 11 per cent, this country's economy is in the worst shape since the 1930s.

Experts say the recovery we are supposedly experiencing now is a jobless one, meaning the economy requires fewer workers for it to get back onto its feet.

But there is hope for Canada's economy. And, believe it or don't, we have the Globe and Mail to thank.

I am not attributing the good news to the Globe's neo-conservative editorialists. Oh, no. The person you should thank is the lowly employee at "Canada's National Newspaper" who lays out the front page, for he or she possesses the most brilliantly subtle economic mind ever in the history of this most dismal science.

If you turn to the front page of the Saturday, May 8 edition of the Globe, you will find the wonderful photograph of Prime Minister Brian Mulroney and Russian President Boris Yeltsin, arms wrapped around each other, standing in front of two freshly killed boars. Beside this photo appears a rather depressing story. Depressing because it tells of how 43,000 people lost their jobs in April.

Now, you may think this Globe employee was suggesting that Mr. Mulroney should not be spending tax dollars abroad on a going away tour while this country flounders in a recession.

But if you are an astute political economist, you would realize the page designer was not taking shots at the Prime Minister, but was proposing, ever so slightly, a solution which would solve this country's recessionary woes: shoot the unemployed.

This may sound a little odd, even morbid or repugnant, but it makes for pristine, logical sense. Think of the benefits:

Unemployment rates would be eliminated for the first time since the Second World War.

Moreover, relieving this country of its unemployed would reduce the dependence upon Canada's much-cherished social programs, allowing for a smaller annual deficit.

And industries would benefit from the profusion of carcasses, using them as an inexpensive resource to manufacture products such as wigs, women's hand bags, men's boots and Halloween skeletons.

But this plan is not without its humanitarian side — the flesh could be used to fertilize the world's famished lands. Failing that, we could use it to produce dog and cat food of a higher calibre. Nothing would go to waste.

All this activity would generate new wealth, which would spur this economy into a speedy recovery, create thousands of jobs and develop a new tax base to repay this country's national debt.

Some of you moralists out there might be so outraged by this suggestion and actually fire off an angry letter to my editor in protest. But think of how simple this scheme would be to implement.

The government could get Canada's economy on its own two feet by eliminating everything that is ailing it with one plan.

Eliminating our unemployed to boost the economy is a simpler option than having the government cut back on the $5.8 billion purchase of 50 hi-tech helicopters and use the savings to create new jobs. Or creating a progressive income-tax system to help pay our debt.

Asking our federal government to do this would be much too much work. They need some time to play golf, hunt or fish. Besides, the unemployed are useless anyway, devouring UI benefits like pigs at a trough. We might as well put them to some use.

43,000 jobs lost last month
Exports fueling growth, experts say

BY ALAN FREEMAN
Pittsburgh, Pa.

OTTAWA — The employment picture is less than rosy for the world's 23rd largest economy, which lost 43,000 jobs in April, according to a report from the U.S. Bureau of Economic Analysis.

The job losses were spread across the country and through most sections of the economy, with the exception of manufacturing, which gained 28,000, offsetting business exports, especially to the United States.

Private-sector economists said the drop in jobs is a further proof that the recovery is being limited by companies that are producing more with fewer workers and that growth still depends on exports rather than domestic consumption. But Statistics Canada warned that the April decline may simply be a correction of inflated job gains in March.

"Exports are still the only game in town," said John Clarke, senior economist at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. "Retail and wholesale trade and all other domestic sectors drove sources of employment down, but we've got an economy that's still running on exports."

However, there were still 144,000 more people at work in April than there were a year ago.

Football Ravens welcome new coach

But can the new man, Donn Smith rebuild the Ravens into a winner?

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

On the fourth finger of his meaty right hand sits a handsome ring. The ring of a Grey Cup champion. Donn Smith, the new head coach of the Carleton Ravens football team, looks at it and smiles.

"If we ever win the Vanier Cup, I'll retire it."

It's a strong statement. But it comes from a strong man with a strong background in winning football games.

His résumé reads like an honor roll of achievements — two Grey Cups with the Ottawa Rough Riders, three Schenley Award nominations as the outstanding Canadian in the CFL, three all-star selections and a national junior championship with the Ottawa Sooners football club. All this only because the six-foot-five, 260-pound centre turned down a seventh round draft pick offer from the Kansas City Chiefs of the NFL.

It's the portrait of a winner. And a winner is exactly what the Ravens need.

Last year the Carleton squad was a perfect 0-7. Over the past four years they've only won twice. In fact, Carleton's last winning season was 1986, when the 6-1 Ravens reached the national semi-finals. Since then, it has been one disappointing season after another with each loss successively worse than the last. And it's been a humiliating time to be a Carleton football fan.

Enter Smith. Hired on for the next three years by Carleton athletic director Keith Harris on April 14 to replace Gary Shaver, it will be his job to return the Ravens to respectability.

"He has good experience on offence, can teach well, has a great public presence, has experience with recruiting and he's accustomed to working in a large institution," Harris says. "I think we were blessed to get him. He's got a tough road ahead of him but I hope he can build confidence in the team this year and build on that."

With the rebuilding job facing him at Carleton, Smith will need to draw upon every ounce of his experience.

Born in Rochester, Minnesota, Donn Smith grew up in Ottawa and Windsor, winning one city football championship after another in his high school years.

Upon graduation, he was recruited by Purdue University of Indiana on a full football scholarship. It was the start of a football career and his chance at a quality education as well.

"That was my approach to it," he says. "What a wonderful opportunity to finance myself and get an education at a major U.S. school at the same time. As long as you met your academic requirements, you kept it. I never paid a cent for my education." While the scholarship had its benefits, it also required a firm commitment to the football program.

"Football down there was a nine-month program. You played in the season, had a workout schedule in the winter, played spring ball, and then had a summer training schedule you had to keep. If you didn't, you fell behind," he says. "Lots of guys in my freshman year never made it back. This was the big time."

At Purdue, Smith pursued a B.Sc. in industrial management, keeping school firmly in hand with football.

On the field, Smith made the team in his sophomore year — another impressive achievement — and centred the offensive line in front of 75,000 screaming fans for the next three years.

His exploits at Purdue attracted NFL attention and he was selected in the seventh round by the Kansas City Chiefs. He turned down their offer and opted to return home to the CFL's Ottawa Rough Riders, who had also drafted him.

Ottawa and the Rough Riders provided the dual challenge Smith was looking for — the opportunity to embark on a business career with the federal government as well as the chance to keep playing football.

"We will win some games this year. I have no doubt of that. How many I can't predict, but we certainly won't go 0-7."

Donn Smith

Two professional careers began.

"It was a pretty demanding cycle but it was exactly the same schedule I had at Purdue. School, then football. I just continued it as a professional. I look back on it now and see it as a very demanding schedule but when you're 20 you have all the energy in the world."

That dual career also provided its fair share of football stories. "There was no way I could call in sick and then have my boss turn on the TV and watch me play out in Vancouver," Smith says with a grin. "Or whenever we lost I'd always end up conducting my own little post-mortem quarterback club in my office."

After an eight-year career with the Riders, Smith was cut from the team with four games to play in the 1980 season after a dispute with head coach George Brancato.

"I voiced my opinion about the way management had unfairly released a player and I was the only one to speak out," Smith says. "I got cut."

End of story.

For the next six years Smith disappeared from the football scene and concentrated on his business career.

"I just dropped totally out of football. Having gone through that regime of four years at a major school studying and playing, eight years as a professional of working and playing — I got to a point where now it was Donn Smith's time. From 1980 to '86 I couldn't even tell you who was on the Rough Rider team. I just got totally out of it. Didn't go to a game or anything. It had been such a large part of my life that I needed a change."

Tackling the opposition head on will bring back the wins says Smith.

But he couldn't stay away forever.

"Football is like a poison," he says.

"Once it's in your system you can never get it out."

So when a coaching opportunity with the University of Ottawa Gee-Gee's presented itself, Smith pounced on it. He spent four years as an offensive line coach with Ottawa and then two more with the Ottawa Sooners junior club.

Success continued to follow him.

The Gee-Gees advanced to the Ontario-Quebec Interuniversity Football conference finals in 1989. The Sooners went to the national championship game in his two years with them, coming away with the junior title in 1992, completing a perfect 13-0 season.

But all that success is now in the past. His future is now with the Ravens. There's plenty of work to be done. Last year the Ravens set league lows in numerous categories. On offence, they mustered only 44 points over seven games. They didn't score their first offensive touchdown until their fourth game of the season. On defence, they surrendered a total of 237 points.

In comparison, Vanier Cup champion Queen's University racked up 225 offensive points over the season while allowing only 102 against. Looking at those numbers, one can readily see why Queen's finished on top and Carleton didn't. Those numbers are indicative of a problem.

As Smith sees it, it's not so much a lack of talent on the Raven squad as a lack of fundamentals and confidence.

"There is tremendous talent on this team," he says. "But there's a lot of basic fundamental skills they need to relearn. Blocking. Tackling. Catching. Throwing. They need to go back to the beginning in specific areas. Once they've got that we'll start building a system around them that's understandable and uncomplicated."

A lack of confidence is another problem Smith plans to tackle. "Once you get into that cycle of losing, it's tough to break out of it," he says. "But I want to send a message to the other teams in this league that we are going to be a force to be reckoned with. Sure, Queen's and Bishops are going to beat us, but it's not going to be a blowout. I want them to walk out of here thinking 'Holy smokes, were we ever lucky.'"

Not only does Smith talk of being competitive, he speaks of actual success on the field.

"We will win some games this year. I have no doubt of that. How many I can't predict, but we certainly won't go 0-7."

"I'm sure they're tired of losing," he says of the Ravens. "You can just imagine how they're going to feel the first game we win. These guys will start believing in themselves again."

Towards that end, Smith candidly admits he's looking for a new commitment from the Ravens.

"If anybody's coming here thinking they have their position locked up, they're in for a very rude awakening come training camp. Because I'm looking for people who have the ability to turn the page on what's been going on here and understand that there's a new regime and a new opportunity."

"And those people that want to seize that opportunity will be disciplined, know how to work hard, and know how to be part of a team environment."

Almost as a warning he then adds, "If guys can't turn the page on what's been going on here the past couple of years, I'll weed them out."

That "seize the day" challenge has players excited.

Sean O'Neill was a back-up quarterback last year. Now he's heading into his second year with a bigger goal.

"I'm excited because it presents a new opportunity," he says. "I could be the starter or I could be cut. That kind of challenge will make everyone work harder and we'll be a better team because of it."

It's this commitment to the alien philosophy of winning that Smith says he hopes to instill among the Ravens.

"The objective I sent home with these guys was that if they do not share in the philosophy that we are in this sport to win the Vanier Cup, then they shouldn't be here. Now we may not achieve that goal next year, but that always has to be the ultimate goal."

The interview in Smith's small locker-room office in Carleton's athletics building ends. He stands up and raises his right hand for a farewell handshake. His Grey Cup ring glints as the sunshine from a window behind his desk hits it.

Maybe, just maybe, one day Smith will retire it and replace it with another one. □

Gym gets new hardwood floor

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

Goodbye rubber. Hello wood. After years of complaints about the hard rubber surface on the floor of Carleton's gym, the athletics department is replacing it with wood.

"The old floor was deteriorating with age," says Brian Hetherington, the facilities-maintenance coordinator of athletics.

"A lot of athletes were getting injured because the floor was losing its bounce and its slip. Some basketball and volleyball athletes were missing half their seasons because they were recuperating from stress-related injuries."

The nature of basketball and volleyball is such that athletes are always starting and stopping. That places a strain on athletes legs. A hardwood floor should help alleviate that strain and lower the number of injuries per year.

"As far as reducing injuries on our team, the past couple of years we've had a number of overuse and stress injuries as early as October in the season. It's something that definitely impacts the way you train and prepare for the season. With the wooden floor we can foresee a number of these injuries not happening," says Marg Jones, Carleton's women's basketball coach.

Hetherington agrees and points to various reports on the two surfaces.

One such study, conducted in 1988 by the Ducker Research Co. of Birmingham, found there is a 70 per cent higher incidence of floor-related injuries on synthetic floors than on hardwood.

The study also found the average number of floor-related injuries on a hardwood floor was seven per year, while on synthetic floors the average number was 12 injuries per year.

"As a result, a lot of schools are going back to hardwood floors after having experienced various problems with the rubber surface," says Hetherington.

Hetherington estimates the new floor will cost $150,000. That's almost twice as much as the $80,000 it would have cost to resurface the floor with another rubber coat. Despite the larger expense, Hetherington defends the decision to go with wood for two reasons.

"If it's maintained properly it will last over 20 years, while a rubber surface would have to be refinished again in 10 years. And it's going to reduce injuries and protect athletes better."

Work on the new floor began May 3. It's expected to be ready for use June 1. □

Close, but no basket

Three crosstown Gee-Gees who received invitations to try out for Canada's national basketball team didn't make the final rosters.

Gee-Gee guard Bobby Brown, who scored 40 points in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association championship game, was invited to try out with the national men's basketball team. Unfortunately for him, he was vacationing in Europe during the try-outs.

Other Gee-Gee Clarence Porter, a 6-4 forward, and Dave Reid, a 6-2 small forward — were cut after the first day of try-outs for the national under-22 team.

Still, it was an honor for them just to be selected, says Gee-Gee coach Jack Eisenmann.

"It doesn't happen often that a CIAU player gets invited to a national program. It's a big honor."

Quebec hockey lives on

The Ontario Universities Athletic Association voted recently at its annual meeting to allow Quebec universities —

McGill, Concordia and Trois-Rivières — to continue playing hockey in the OUAA. It was considering not allowing Quebec schools permission to play in the OUAA because of finances, travel time and time away from school for athletes.

If only things were so easy for the Carleton hockey club.

Locals make team

Three Laurentian University players with local connections have been named to two national women's basketball teams following a try-out camp in Toronto. Forward Nana Robinson of Nepean was named to the Canadian women's team. Martha Sandilands of Nepean and guard Carolyn Swords of Ottawa were named to the national student team for the World University Games in Buffalo, N.Y., July 8-19.

RANT 'N' RAVEN

by David Sall
Charlatan Staff

Judging by his credentials, Donn Smith loves a challenge.

It's a good thing, too.

If it's a challenge he wants as the newly appointed head coach of the football Ravens, he's got one.

It's hard to say exactly how Smith felt when he saw what he was getting into, but you can get a general idea. Probably kind of like Bob Rae felt when Floyd Laughren walked into his office a while back and said, "Mind if I run a few numbers by you?"

In fact, the Ravens are a lot like the Ontario government. They both have a serious deficit problem.

Last season's Ravens scored 44 points and allowed the opposition to score 237. That's a difference of 193 points — meaning the Ravens were outscored by an average of 28 points a game.

Smith, who ran the offence for last year's Canadian junior champion Ottawa Sooners, knows all this. To his credit, he knows it won't be easy to fix, either.

"Once you get into that cycle of losing, it's tough to break out of it," he says.

This whole scenario should sound familiar to Ravens fans. Didn't somebody named George Brancato — who also had some pretty impressive credentials — get hired to fix the same team last year?

Indeed he did. Brancato, a Grey Cup-winning coach in the CFL, was put in charge of the offence before last season. Needless to say, it did not respond well.

But look a little deeper and you'll see it's not really fair to compare the two.

For Brancato, coaching the Ravens probably wasn't an all-consuming passion. He wasn't the head man and got paid next to nothing. He was having fun just keeping his hand in the game he loves.

For Smith, this is his chance to prove himself as a head coach. He's played and coached on winning teams and wants Carleton to be a winning team.

And he's already made it clear he won't put up with anybody who doesn't.

"If guys can't turn the page on what's been going on here the past couple of years, I'll weed them out," he says bluntly. "The objective I sent home with these guys was that if they do not share in the philosophy that we are in this sport to win the Vanier Cup, then they shouldn't be here."

Too many Carleton teams in the past have played like they're supposed to be punching bags for everybody else. Coaches have gotten away with making the same platitudes about having "a winning attitude" year after year.

Smith's statement is the most definitive commitment to excellence from a Raven coach in a long time. And when Smith is committed to something, past experience shows he means it.

As a Rough Rider in 1980, for instance, he felt a teammate was released unfairly and confronted his coach. He lost his job, but he kept his honor.

Ironically, the coach who released him was George Brancato.

And now, Smith will try to succeed where his old boss couldn't. It could very well be the biggest challenge Donn Smith has ever faced. □

World Tea Party

Daniel Dion
National Gallery of Canada
May 1 — July 4

Wondering what the link is between tea drinking and increased global harmony? Well, maybe you aren't, but there is one art exhibit that can give you some insight into this profound concept. It's entitled World Tea Party and it's the creation of Montreal artist Daniel Dion.

First, a little background information: Dion is an artist with a 15-year career in photography and video production and installation. The National Gallery is exhibiting three of Dion's video works, including World Tea Party, which was specially commissioned by the gallery.

With all this in mind and only a vague idea of what to expect, I headed off to the gallery on a Saturday afternoon. What I discovered was that World Tea Party is quite a departure from the usual gallery offerings.

The exhibit is sponsored in part by a grant from the Canada Tea Council. It fills a whole room with tea-related paraphernalia, surrounding all five senses with the universal experience of drinking tea.

Artwork and fact posters extolling the virtues of tea hang from the walls. Old tea sets wait on display and gallery-goers sit around tables talking, while waiters serve them tea. World Tea Party has the atmosphere of a busy afternoon in a European restaurant. The key idea here is interaction, with observers becoming part of what they are observing.

"It's more process than product," says Dion. "It works as an interactive system."

World Tea Party includes paintings from other parts of the gallery to give the exhibit a local flavor. It is meant to change and evolve, reflecting where and when it is being exhibited, as it moves from city to city.

Dion hopes World Tea Party will encourage people to communicate. He says its major goal is "to get people to know each other better who don't normally associate."

According to Dion, this piece of art had its genesis in another project. Dion thought it might be interesting to get some international artists together for an exchange of ideas and to begin friendships. Nothing came of this, but the concept of community and communication remained with Dion.

He combined this idea with the custom of tea drinking: a truly international tradition with one-billion cups downed daily by people everywhere. World Tea Party reflects this international flavor with tea supplied by the Sri Lankan High Commission and artwork from Japan, England, America and elsewhere.

World Tea Party is unique among your standard, formulaic art exhibits. This "playing with the concept of art," as Dion puts it, is out to challenge the idea that art is only two-dimensional and has to hang on the wall of some empty room. His approach tries to show it can be much more than that.

There is also another, more subtle point to World Tea Party.

"It brings technology into contact so it doesn't look so inaccessible," says Dion, revealing the presence of a hidden camera in the ceiling.

In response to the movement of people, the camera triggers video screens which show documentaries about

"While there is tea, there is hope" - British playwright Sir Arthur Wing Pinero the history and nature of tea.

Video is one common feature in Dion's other projects as well. He says video is just a natural part of his life, as a member of the "TV generation." At the exhibit's opening, he could even be spotted taking everything in with a hand-held video camera.

Dion hopes this demystification of technology will show that "you don't have to be a techno" to reap its benefits.

If this exhibit accomplishes anything, it at least brings a new atmosphere into part of the gallery. Breaking up that mind-numbing silence and getting rid of all those armed guards hanging around is no small accomplishment.

Hmmm... people talking, having FUN? — a radical new concept for the gallery and maybe the start of a new trend. □

Those Shadowy Men behind the Kids in the Hall

Shadowy Men on a Shadowy Planet Zaphod Beeblebrox May 6

"We (bassist Reid Diamond and guitarist Brian Connelly) grew up on a farm. And sometimes we would just go outside and the moon would be out there and Brian would say something like, 'I wonder if there are shadowy men on that shadowy planet?' We just made it up. It's not referencing anything... except maybe the post-nuclear world."

- Reid Diamond, on the meaning of life, or something

It was a cool evening on May 6, but inside Zaphod Beeblebrox it was hot and muggy. People jammed into the club to listen and dance to Shadowy Men on a Shadowy Planet. This Toronto trio is best known for supplying the music for Kids in the Hall, CBC's mega-popular, ultra-cool comedy offering.

Opening the evening's entertainment was Los Angeles's Popdefect. Their punk sound was punctuated with uneven playing and off-key vocals, but they did manage to play some original tunes as well as an interesting version of The Association's "Windy."

Up next was Girl Trouble, a quartet from Tacoma, Wash., who will tour with the Shadowy Men throughout the summer. Their retro-60s, country rock-charged set was helped out considerably by their lead singer, who paraded around the stage like a displaced country-lounge singer.

As the Shadowy Men took to the stage, the dance floor became crowded. When the band swung into their trademark song, "Harlem by the Sea" (a.k.a. the theme from Kids in the Hall), the floor was packed.

It's always a pleasure to watch a band who really enjoys what they do, and the Shadowy Men is one of these bands. They're tight and can stop on a dime, evidence of their precision playing.

Although most people think of the Shadowy Men in tandem with the Kids in the Hall, the group has been together since 1984. Their association with the Kids began when that comedy troupe made their television debut four years ago.

"Me and Brian and Bruce (McCullough, a Kid in the Hall) grew up on a farm just outside of Calgary," says Diamond, explaining the crossover between the two groups. "Eventually we all ended up moving to Toronto. We met Don (Pyle, their drummer) in Toronto, we started the band and met some of the others who started Kids in the Hall. It was never like an audition thing."

Does the band ever get tired of being associated with the Kids?

"Never," says Diamond. "I wish it would happen more. But we don't flaunt it."

The Shadowy Men's distinctive twangy beach sound has led them to be classified by some as a surf band, hence the song on their latest disc, Sport Fishin', entitled "We're Not a Fucking Surf Band."

"It was the easiest way for people to describe what we were doing," recalls Connelly. "Because we had no lyrics, it was just twangy guitar, and surf comes to

Shadowy Men would probably be more accurately described as a riff band. Their encore at the Zaphod show featured a medley of rock riffs paying tribute to such songs as "The Boys Are Back In Town," "School's Out," "All The Young Dudes," "Satisfaction" and "Ballroom Blitz."

But whether you choose to call them a riff band, a TV band or even a "fucking surf band," the fact still remains that they've managed the impossible: attracting something resembling a mass audience without hardly singing a word. □

The lowdown on Velocity Girl (name taken from an obscure Primal Scream song): they've just released an album on Sub Pop, they play dreamy indie guitar pop, and, if you believe their bassist, they can barely play their instruments.

Hailing from Silver Spring, Md., and part of the burgeoning Washington, D.C., music scene, the young band has a reputation it would rather forget about.

While Guns 'n Roses and other like-minded groups are fulfilling the rock stereotype of self-destructive anarchists, Velocity Girl has been typecast as a (God forbid) cute band.

"It's kind of a curse," says bassist Kelly Riles. "But it's better to be that than the ugliest band that can play nice pop. I guess if we can be a cute band that plays good pop, that's okay."

Velocity Girl — which also includes guitarists Archie Moore and Brian Nelson, vocalist and sole female member Sarah Shannon, and drummer Jim Spellman — is a clean-cut band. Their appearances won't get your parents muttering about why these rock types never seem to wash. And, as the man says, they can play good pop.

Copacetic, their debut release, boasts four excellent pure pop tunes, one raw guitar tune and enough mood to satisfy any indie guitar band fan.

Highlighting the whole package is Shannon, whose voice exudes innocence and teen angst. Not bad for a band that, according to Riles, couldn't play their instruments a scant four years ago.

"It was definitely something that started as friends," remarks Riles on the genesis of the band. "It certainly didn't start with anything resembling a collection of musical talent waiting to be exposed because we didn't — and to some extent still don't — know how to play very well."

"When we started, we didn't know how to play at all. We're all from the same area, and we had the same musical interests, so the band just seemed like a natural thing."

This idea that friendship is more important than the music itself comes through in the way the band is run. On the album, there are no credits for lyrics or melodies. Everyone does everything.

"On a given instrument somebody will have more say, but other people certainly helped come up with the vocal melodies or the lyrics," says Riles. "Jim's the drummer but he's come up with guitar parts because he used to be a guitar player. Everybody contributes or critiques according to their own perspective and then we come up with a happy — but sometimes it's an unhappy — medium of what everyone wants."

"There's no one Velocity Girl," he continues. "The five people you see up in front of you are the five people doing their thing."

As for not knowing how to play their instruments, Riles is perhaps being a bit modest. True, Copacetic does feature some music that is quite basic, but underneath it all is an instinct for good pop that isn't obscured by complex guitar solos or by a slick production job.

To get that unpolished, bare rock sound, they recorded and mixed the album in only 10 days. This didn't go over well with some folks, says Riles.

"A lot of people were taken aback and were disappointed because we didn't come up with this polished gem of slick, super rock. What I like about it is that it was really raw and the songs stand by themselves. The production doesn't get in the way of that."

To promote Copacetic, Velocity Girl is currently spreading the word on a short headlining tour with Jale, Halifax's very own Sub Poppers. On May 15, they hit Les Foufounes Electriques in Montreal with their delicate wall of noise.

The Girls, along with Jale and the local band Pest, treated the regrettably less-than-capacity audience to an evening of catchy pop tunes, along with Shannon's attempt at some sort of calisthenics. No rock and roll nastiness was to be found here.

Mr. Bassist did, at one point swing the neck of his bass toward an amp, à la Kurt Cobain, but restrained himself and merely gave the amp a gentle tap. Again, a nice band.

This short tour comes after a month-long tour of the United States supporting Belly that was, um, eventful.

"In one tour," says Riles, "Brian got hit by a car, Jim and Dave (a representative from Sub Pop) subsequently got into a fight with the person who hit Brian, I got hit by a 2 X 4, and we ran out of gas in Texas."

Hopefully, they'll have better luck headlining.

Despite all the wear and tear that accompanies touring, there is one thing (besides a paycheck) that will help them when they get home and tackle their next album. Namely, the increased proficiency that comes with playing every night.

"We're really tired of (the songs), just because when you've played a song a hundred times it's not as interesting anymore," says Riles. "The cool thing is that you get better at playing."

Their debut album delivers the goods. If they learn to play their instruments, expect the stars. □

Capital budget passes CUSA council

by Mario Carlucci and Karin Jordan
Charlatan staff

A flashing billboard that, according to CUSA finance commissioner René Faucher, makes you feel "like a deer caught in the headlights" will soon be installed in the Unicentre.

CUSA council approved this project as part of the 1993-94 capital budget for the undergraduate students' association at a meeting on June 21.

The $106,717 capital budget covers long-term investments like office equipment and construction. Included in the budget are items like about $21,000 for CKCU's station equipment, $1,150 for blinds in the Foot Patrol office and $750 for Faucher's new blinds.

John Edwards, a third-year arts and social sciences representative, was the only councillor to vote against the budget. Edwards had moved to table the budget for further consideration, but the motion was defeated.

Edwards says council did not have enough time to look over the capital budget.

"At most, I think people had the weekend to look at it. I don't know what the rush was (to pass the budget)." He says council should have scrutinized the capital budget more closely.

"I got the budget this afternoon. Even so, I don't think a weekend is enough time."

The budget includes $13,000 for an electronic display billboard to be built beside Info Carleton on the fourth floor of the Unicentre. Faucher says the billboard will be used to publicize upcoming CUSA events.

Two existing electronic billboards in the Unicentre — outside the entrance to Oliver's and by the off-campus lounge — can't be repaired, says Faucher, because the company CUSA bought them from has been bankrupt for four years.

The new billboard will display moving graphics and will have over 250 pre-programmed advertisements, including ads from Coca-Cola and the Royal Bank. Companies will be able to buy advertising space on or around the edge of the board, which will be five by seven feet.

Faucher says the new board will "grab people" with its flashy graphics and will be an effective way of promoting CUSA-sponsored events like the Charity Ball or Halloween Superpub. "It's bright. You're going to have no choice but to look at it."

The market price for the board is $26,000. CUSA got the board for half this price because McDonald's had placed an order for more than a thousand signs with a manufacturer CUSA had approached.

Faucher says the board, which will be in place in August, is one way CUSA is looking at to increase communication between the association and students.

But Edwards has his doubts. "I don't know if we should be spending $13,000 on this (the billboard)," he says.

The capital budget also includes a $30,000 contingency fund for projects that may come up unexpectedly during the year. The 1992-93 contingency fund was $20,000.

Faucher says the extra $10,000 is needed for plans which have not yet been approved by the university, but which CUSA has cost estimates for.

For example, Faucher says CUSA wants to put illuminated outdoor billboards around the Unicentre building to promote CUSA events. These would cost about $3,500 each.

Faucher says if an unexpected renovation is needed during the year, he'll "have the luxury of having somewhat of a slush fund for that."

Edwards says council should have questioned the budget more carefully, because they are supposed to be a check on the executive. But he says he feels that isn't the case right now.

"Council right now tends to support the executive. I just hope the council doesn't support the executive on everything." □

Campus spiffed up for Learned's conference

by Josée Bellemare
Charlatan staff

Blooming flowers, new stairs and brand-spanking-new signs were speedily delivered to Carleton in time for the Learned Societies Conference.

The conference, held on campus from May 30 to June 13, brought about 7,000 professors and students from universities worldwide to Carleton, where close to 3,000 papers were presented. Between 2,500 and 3,000 delegates stayed in the campus residences.

Carter Elwood, co-ordinator for the Learned Societies Conference, says Carleton didn't spend any money for the conference.

"Carleton didn't advance any money," he says. "The conference is self-supporting." He says Carleton only provided the space to hold meetings and conferences.

During May, flower beds sprung up across campus, the stairs beside the Unicentre were rebuilt and new directional signs were installed.

Stan Britton, manager of construction services, says the signs and flowers were planned to coincide with the beginning of the conference.

"Most of the flowers were from our normal annual program," he says. Britton also says additional funding from the Learned Societies' budget paid for more flower pots than usual.

"There were volunteer gardeners free of charge and the Learned's paid for the flowers itself," he says. Elwood also says some of the 20 volunteers donated flowers.

New signs also sprung up on campus rather quickly.

Elwood says he urged physical plant at a signage committee meeting to construct the signs before the conference. He says he thought the signs would make the campus look nicer for the conference.

"The Learned's provided a catalyst to make signs," says Britton. "They influenced the project to go now instead of later."

Britton says the signs were also posted to give better directions for the professors.

"We had terrible signs before," he says.

Britton says the severely damaged stairs on the south side of the Unicentre facing Mackenzie field were repaired before the conference also for the positive image. The repairs to those stairs, which cost $25,000, are part of a $114,000-project to repair 11 sets of stairs around campus, says Britton.

Administration budget in red four years in a row

by Franco D'Orazio
Charlatan staff

Carleton's attempt to balance its budget this year will likely be tipped far into the red for a fourth consecutive year.

In April, Carleton's Board of Governors approved a $200 million budget projecting a $10,000 surplus for this fiscal year.

Entering the fourth year of a five-year plan, the small surplus would have been a start in the university's goal to eliminate its $4.3 million debt, accumulated over the last three years, by May 1, 1995.

But the Ontario government's social contract, a cost-cutting initiative to reduce the provincial debt, will have a devastating effect on Carleton's five-year plan.

Of the $2 billion the provincial government intends to cut from spending, $500 million will come from the province's budget for education, says David Schouler, an information officer with the Ministry of Education and Training.

It is estimated Carleton will lose $9.4 million, according to Bill Pickett, Carleton's director of budget planning.

"We could save $9.4 million on roll-backs of wages or lose that money on the cutting of grants," says Pickett.

He says the university's 1993-94 budget was determined at several meetings during the year, "prior to the announcement that this money is being removed." But there is no indication from where the university will have to cut its budget.

"The unknowns are extremely high right now," Pickett says, "and it's very confusing."

Complicating the matter more, Pickett says, is that the government will legislate the cuts by Aug. 1 at the latest, unless it can reach an agreement on cost-saving measures with the province's public unions.

This will fall well into Carleton's fiscal year, which begins May 1 and ends April 30 of the following year.

The university balanced its budget this year despite stagnant funding from the Ontario government, which the board expects to increase by less than one per cent to $100 million for this year.

Originally, Carleton would have balanced its books by increasing its revenue and decreasing its expenses.

The university would have increased revenues this year by 4.8 per cent to $207.8 million, while increasing its expenditures by only three per cent to $207.79 million.

Departments suffering the most severe cuts in funding were public relations (20 per cent) and alumni services (43 per cent), whose budgets were cut by more than $600,000 combined.

But university funding for student services such as counselling and health services increased 25 per cent — by far the largest increase, raising its budget to $1.9 million from $1.5 million. Full-time and part-time salaries account for most of the increase.

Salaries for professors account for two-thirds of Carleton's operating budget, rising 3.6 per cent this year to nearly $102 million. □

University book-balancing hits library

by Franco D'Orazio
Charlatan staff

Despite a small increase in its operating budget, there will be some big changes at the library this year.

The library's budget was increased by $30,019 to $11.95 million this year.

But salaries for part-time employees, most of whom are students, were slashed by more than one-third to $388,834, from $600,000.

In an April 9 letter to the university's Senate, M. Ian Cameron of the English department warned that "cuts in the library's part-time budget will inescapably cause the library to diminish the services it now offers."

Linda Rossman, associate librarian for information services, agrees, explaining that circulation and the reshelving of books will suffer the most.

"Basically, we will have to cut down on the amount of hourly staff we would normally hire, which means we would be closing the library earlier in the evening," she says, although she does not yet know how early.

Rossman says the library will save $100,000 to meet its budget by cutting the library's subscriptions to serials and periodicals in consultation with all the faculties.

Another cost-cutting measure is buying cheaper paperbacks instead of higher-priced hardcover books.

"A lot of books are printed in paperback and hardcover formats simultaneously, and we can save 15 per cent, probably more, by purchasing the paperbacks," Rossman says binding paperbacks after some wear is still cheaper than buying hardcovers. □

CUSA dishes up new look for Oliver's

by Karin Jordan
Charlatan staff

Oliver's will still have the same name this fall, but there are big changes in store for the campus bar.

At a June 21 CUSA council meeting, finance commissioner René Faucher announced plans for renovating Oliver's. The renovations will cost the undergraduate students' association $320,000 and will be completed by Sept. 1.

CUSA closed the bar March 1 because it had a deficit of more than $90,000. According to Faucher, the bar had been losing business for about four years.

Faucher says the new and improved Oliver's will be "more pub-ish" than before and will draw in many new customers.

The bar will be divided into smaller sections than last year, with its two large rooms. Billiards tables will be moved into the front section of Oliver's from the games area on the first floor of the Unicentre.

The games room area will be filled with a commercial operation, says Faucher. One option he's considering is a compact disc store.

"We're going to judge whether it's a good service and whether it's something students are going to use. We're going to have to be very selective. A CD store might work."

Faucher says he'll make sure the store only hires Carleton students.

Oliver's will also have a stage, a dance floor, couches and booths. The bar area will be much larger, with eight beer taps. Fake wood panelling will complete the "pub-ish" atmosphere.

Faucher says the new concept for Oliver's — smaller areas — makes it a multipurpose bar. For example, it will be more suitable for small events.

"This bar is ideal for small, local bands — Carleton bands or whatever — to play to an audience of 100 people and make it feel like it's a great venue, as opposed to the big empty gymnasium with a few chairs. That was the effect that we had in the past, where you needed 500 people to have a good event."

Faucher says the bar will be promoted during orientation week more than it was last year.

"Students set their behavior trends when it comes to the social part — bars and things like that — right at the beginning of the year. Especially first-year people."

"And (last) year what we did was had a $200,000 orientation program that really all it did was promote off-campus bars and off-campus areas. What we did was we killed our own bar."

Last year, orientation events took place at off-campus bars such as On Tap.

Faucher says Oliver's may also be serving up Domino's pizza, even though Domino's is not owned by Capital Foods, the company which has been contracted by administration to run all food operations outside of residence.

He says the contract between university administration and Capital Foods "is kind of vague in certain areas."

Faucher says they can bring in an operation that is not owned or operated by Capital Foods "if we do limited operation just in our area, without competing with anything that (Capital Foods) is doing around the university. That's the interpretation we have."

Faucher says Domino's won't be competing with Capital Foods even though Hugo's serves pizza, because Domino's offers higher-quality pizza.

But bringing in an outside operation still needs to be approved by the university administration, says Dave Sterritt, director of housing and food services.

Sterritt says Oliver's has not been designated as an area where Capital Foods can operate.

But "there's still the issue of whether or not the university administration will approve bringing in an outside operation, whether it's Domino's or Pizza Pizza."

Faucher says all he wants is for Oliver's to stay out of financial trouble.

"I'm not looking for Oliver's to become a cash cow. I just want it to break even. But I think it is a service." □

WDN to be letters of the past

by Mario Carlucci and Karin Jordan
Charlatan staff

Students withdrawing from courses at Carleton will no longer see the letters WDN on their official transcripts.

A motion eliminating the term "withdrawn" in reference to course withdrawals was passed June 8 by the Senate Committee on Admission and Studies Policy.

A "withdrawn" appears on the transcript of a student who has dropped a course before the deadline set out in the university course calendar.

It is not possible to withdraw from a course after the university deadline. A student who drops a course after the deadline for withdrawals will get an FNS on their transcript, meaning she or he has failed the course and there is no supplemental exam.

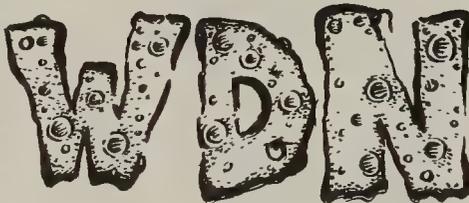

A committee memo says "withdrawn" should be seen as an internal matter, "one that should stay on student (records) for our internal records." The memo was written by Professor Robert Lovejoy, the committee's chair, to the clerk of the senate.

Lovejoy writes that an internal record of withdrawal needs to be kept for committees of appeal, registrarial officers and advisors.

The memo says the term "withdrawn" should not be published since it could be misinterpreted by officials outside of the university. The committee's report says prospective employers may see the term "withdrawn" on a transcript as "an indication of something amiss with the student's work habits or abilities."

Gary Anandasangaree, director of academics for the undergraduate students' association, says the change will be positive if it can help Carleton students compete better with other university graduates when it comes to getting jobs.

"As it stands, Carleton students are at a disadvantage," says Anandasangaree.

He says many other universities, including Queen's, Trent and Waterloo, don't publish withdrawals on official transcripts.

Carleton isn't alone in publishing WDN on student transcripts. The University of Ottawa, Guelph and Western Ontario — among others — still publish "withdrawn" on students' official transcripts. □ construction in some areas, but there were also delays.

The expansion and extension of the Herzberg building and additional stair repairs around campus were postponed for the conference.

"We stopped the construction of the stairs because of the noise of the jackhammers," says Britton. "Carleton was putting forward a positive image."

Some delegates at Carleton that week were pleased with the conference and the newly revamped campus.

The Progressive Conservative leadership convention caused some problems with hotel and airline accommodation for Patricia Taylor, a professor at the University of Windsor.

"Having the conference at the same time as the Tory convention caused a bit of problems with the airline and hotels," she said. "We drove."

Barbara Gill, a professor at the University of New Brunswick, appreciated Carleton's green spaces.

"You have a lovely campus here," she said. "You don't know you're in a city." □

Three flashings in last two months

by Charlatan staff

Three recent incidents of flashing on campus are unrelated, according to university security.

On May 9 at 1:00 p.m., a naked man entered Paterson Hall and grabbed a female student. She struggled free and fled.

On June 14, a man exposed himself to a female student studying in the Loeb Building.

The description for both flashers is of a caucasian male, five feet nine inches tall, with a slender build and short brown hair.

Most recently, at around 11 p.m. on June 18, a man flashed two women working in a computer lab in the Loeb Building. According to the security posters, he also indecently touched one of the women before leaving the area. The man is described as a six-foot-tall caucasian, with dark-brown hair and a full beard.

"It would be a mistake to draw the conclusion that it is the same person necessarily," says Len Boudreault, assistant director of the department of university safety.

Boudreault says all three incidents are "completely under investigation, both by us and the city police."

He says security has not been stepped up in the buildings where the flashings happened.

"We simply pay more attention to those areas," he says.

CAMPUS BRIEFS

He says a precaution people can take to avoid flashers is to work in groups in a secure area.

Boudreault says anyone who sees anything suspicious, including someone who fits the description of the flashers, should report it to the department immediately. □

NDP taxes health insurance premiums

by Charlatan staff

Carleton students who buy health and accident insurance through CUSA, the undergraduate students' association, will have to pay an eight per cent tax on their premiums next year.

The provincial government recently announced that retail sales tax will be applied to all health insurance premiums starting July 1, 1993.

This tax effectively eliminates the 10-per-cent reduction in premiums CUSA obtained from Great West Life and Seaboard Life in April, leaving students with a two-per-cent reduction in costs.

CUSA negotiated a two-year contract with Great West Life for prescription drugs and Seaboard Life for accident insurance which cost $45.40 for a student and $87.15 for family coverage per year.

Last year, the premium for a student was $50.65 for coverage by Blue Cross and Seaboard Life.

The new, NDP-adjusted premium will be $49.05. □

UBC student paper gets new operator

by Franco D'Orazio
Charlatan Staff

One of Canada's oldest student newspapers at the University of British Columbia recently gained a nanny — or a watch-dog, depending on your perspective.

The Alma Mater Society (AMS), UBC's student government, moved June 2 to create a publications board to oversee The Ubyessey, which turns 75 years old this year.

The AMS said the paper has been suspended from publishing this summer due to cost overruns of $25,000 incurred over the last school year.

The elected editorial staff of the paper have been allowed to use the office temporarily, but their budget has been suspended. They must decide whether or not to apply to the board in the fall for reinstatement and funding as the recognized student newspaper.

The new board will replace the student government as the paper's publisher, making it solely responsible for The Ubyessey.

"We're reinstating a structure that has always been our option," said AMS vice-president Janice Boyle.

An AMS publications board oversaw various student publications, including The Ubyessey, from 1915 until the 1960s, when the paper changed to a collective, democratic structure.

However, the paper has never been able to achieve financial autonomy from the AMS, despite two attempts in the 1980s. In each case, students rejected a Ubyessey request in a referendum for a direct student levy as the paper's source of income.

Boyle said she would prefer an autonomous Ubyessey because it would relieve the AMS from editorial responsibility as well as financial control.

"Autonomy is always an option," Boyle said. "In fact, it's a dream I have."

"But in the last two years the level of professionalism at the paper has declined and students would not support the paper achieving autonomy, and they (the paper's staff) know that."

But Graham Cook, the elected news co-ordinator of the suspended paper, disagrees.

"You can't make general blanket statements like that," he said. "There's been support for the paper. We've done a survey, and it's a fifty-fifty split."

The AMS has deleted all references to the paper from its constitution. The power to control any campus-wide publications will revert to the new board.

The board will consist of three AMS members, two UBC students at large, two representatives from each publication and three UBC alumni approved by the AMS, including one who is involved with the commercial press.

The AMS will choose its board members as well as ratifying the alumni selections. Together, these five members will choose the student members-at-large.

Boyle said the board is expected to be in place by August.

The board will also see that all publications are fiscally responsible, even though The Ubyessey will still receive funding from the AMS.

Boyle said the AMS doesn't want legal responsibility for what the paper publishes, nor does it want to spend as much time as it has recently listening to complaints about the newspaper's content.

Last year, the paper faced harsh criticism and a libel suit from B.C. Transit in the wake of an editorial counselling students how to cheat the bus in protest of rising bus fares. As well, a supervisor from one of the women's dormitories on campus started a campaign to boycott the paper's advertisers in the wake of a graphic Valentine's Day sex supplement.

"The board was designed to simply give students the feeling that they're being heard when they have a complaint," Boyle said.

The publications board will enforce very broad guidelines drafted by the student council which, according to an AMS press release, "provides for a minimum standard for all publications ensuring quality of journalism and professionalism."

Boyle insisted, however, that the board would not control editorial content.

But Cook said he fears the board could be used to shut down the paper on a whim.

"The fact is that when you give this arbitrary power (to shut down a paper) to someone, they tend to use it," said Cook. "And this board will be under a lot of pressure from the university to use it to prevent The Ubyessey from doing what it is supposed to do."

Cook said it is the paper's job to publish critical and controversial articles.

Alayne Armstrong, president of the national student newspaper co-operative called the Canadian University Press, was also critical of the board's powers in a June 17 letter addressed to Boyle.

In it she wrote: "... the board has the power 'in extraordinary circumstances (to) take such action as may be necessary' where an editor or member of a publication has 'knowingly acted to the detriment of the publication and of the (Alma Mater) Society as a whole.'"

"This is a broad and easily abused power despite the 'checks and balances' ... provided. Essentially, the AMS has given this board the power to fire or dismiss editors and staff."

Another factor which led the AMS to create the board was that The Ubyessey did not have a constitution and that the paper's collective make-up was no longer effective, according to Boyle.

The paper's staff drafted a constitution and presented it to the AMS at a meeting in May, Boyle said, but their draft still would have made the student government responsible for the paper's content.

But Cook accused the AMS of dealing in bad faith with The Ubyessey because the paper had worked on a constitution for weeks, only to learn that the student government had already decided to create the publications board.

Ex-Ubyessey staff upset

In its 74-year history, The Ubyessey has produced some of Canada's best-known journalists, including columnists Eric Nicol and Peter Worthington.

During its constitutional crisis last year, The Ubyessey appealed for help from two of its more prominent alumni, Maclean's columnist Allan Fotheringham and author Pierre Berton.

Fotheringham said he wrote a letter supporting the paper six months ago and was upset when he heard about the paper's recent suspension.

"It was one of the best student newspapers in Canada for most of the century," said Fotheringham.

He said the AMS acted in a predictably heavy-handed manner when faced with an adversarial Ubyessey.

"All establishments want to shut down all newspapers," he said.

Joe Schleisinger, The Ubyessey's editor-in-chief in 1952-53 and now CBC television's chief political correspondent, said the publications board will end legitimate criticism of student council.

"Now they're going to start a safe, boring little paper that no one will sue and no one will read," he said. "The Ubyessey gave that campus life, a sense of community."

However, Fotheringham noted the paper had become increasingly alienated from the student body in recent years.

"It got terribly earnest and left-wing," he said, adding it dealt with non-student issues as much as it did with campus-related news.

"It's not something people pick up and argue about," he said.

Fotheringham said he is unsure if he will write a column about The Ubyessey's predicament or if he will act on the paper's behalf.

"I would have to disagree with that to an extent," Boyle said, explaining that the board was one of five options discussed at the May meeting and that the paper's staff knew that all along.

The fate of The Ubyessey and its current editorial staff remains undecided.

The paper has appealed for support to the Canadian University Press and still hopes to somehow reverse the AMS's decision.

However, Cook said he may apply for reinstatement of The Ubyessey under the control of the publications board.

Students choose poverty: federal Tory report

by Arn Keeling
Charlatan Staff

A federal report from the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women recommends changes to the definition of poverty that will exclude many students.

The committee's latest report, "Towards 2000: Eliminating Child Poverty," recommends full-time students without dependents should not be included in new bench-marks evaluating poverty and "income inequality."

The federal government currently uses a Statistics Canada poverty assessment called the Low Income Cut-Off to determine funding for social programs such as income assistance. The committee is now looking at how that assessment is determined and how it is used.

"We're just trying to see who's really poor," says the committee chair, Progressive Conservative MP Barbara Greene.

The committee, also says families headed by full-time students should answer questionnaires to establish their level of economic hardship.

"Post-secondary students make their choices voluntarily," says the report, tabled in the House of Commons June 15. "Most students do not suffer a low standard of living in the same way as do truly poor persons."

She says Statistics Canada should collect more specific data on living in poverty, using such devices as questionnaires.

Greene says such questionnaires should be used to make the current Low Income Cut-Off figure more accurate. This is determined by Statistics Canada based on income surveys which indicate whether a person or family is living in poverty.

Jocelyn Charron, communications officer for the Canadian Federation of Students (CFS), says students do suffer from low incomes and are suffering even more from government cutbacks.

"It may be true (that students) choose to go to school, but they don't choose the conditions where grants are cut, aid is cut and tuition is raised," he says.

Under the heading "The Case of Students," the report says students "choose to forego current income in exchange for expectations of higher future income and in exchange for the intangible benefits associated with greater learning."

But Charron says the report reveals the government's misunderstanding of the conditions faced by students and the supposed benefits obtained from a post-secondary education.

"They look on student poverty as a given," he said. "That mentality really shows their (the committee members') age."

But Greene says the committee hopes questionnaires will establish whether or

Giving A shit

"I went from a small special education class in public school to a big collegiate high school with 1,500 students . . . I had great difficulty learning in the large classrooms. I couldn't ask questions. I didn't care enough to ask questions. I would skip and get behind. The year before I had failed the whole year so when I came back it was even worse. I dropped out. My parents took me to a family psychiatrist who I still hate to this day. He wasn't sympathetic to me because I wasn't paying for the sessions. (My parents) were always right. He (told them) to 'kick her out and make her live in a group home to smarten her up.' I took that as a threat. I never thought it would happen to me. I had just turned 16 and I took off. I realize the garbage and stress that I caused for my mom right now, but at that time I didn't care. Two weeks later I came home. It was in the evening and I wasn't welcome. My mom went hysterical and called the police. It all came crashing down on me. My life changed in that one night. I was sent to a hostel where I had to stay for a month. Even during Christmas. It was very depressing."

So goes the story of Katrin Clouse, an alumna of the Kensington Youth Theatre Employment Skills (KYTES) project, a program for socially disadvantaged youth in Toronto. Clouse was one of a small group of KYTES members who came to the FED UP protest May 15 on Parliament Hill.

Sitting on the Hill's concrete staircase, Clouse and her friends looked like any other group among the thousands taking part in the demonstration. Nothing identified them as an organized group, except the black flag carried by one member.

They travelled from Toronto to protest the federal government's funding-cut of $346,000 to the KYTES program, which makes up more than half its annual budget. The cut was announced March 17 and the organization has a wind-down budget until the end of July.

KYTES is a full-time, 20-week program which pays minimum-wage to youth with problems like substance-abuse, homelessness or illiteracy.

"The program is the job in which they practice having a job," says Ned Dickens, KYTES councillor and theatre director. "We develop skills like 'giving a shit', being there and working with other people." Dickens describes KYTES as a "pre-employment" skills program.

Half the program is devoted to academic upgrading, where members can earn high-school credits in subjects such as English, math and family studies, with a teacher on the premises. For the other half, they create and perform a play.

"They do everything: they write it, direct it, light it and design and build the set," says Dickens. "I am just a tool kit, a resource base. I offer a number of different ways to approach different problems and in the end if I am excluded (from the process) I have achieved the goal of the program."

"I felt very alienated. I didn't make education a priority. I made making friends, becoming cool my priorities — popularity. I had blue hair in a very conservative preppy school. It was a matter of wanting to make friends but hating everybody there. There was a group of about 10 of us. We were the 'rejects of the school.' We didn't have anything in common with anybody. We'd go out and steal cars."

KYTES will be funded by the federal government no longer, because the Department of Employment and Immigration defines its success in terms of the number of kids getting jobs.

"We provided the funding with a commitment from KYTES administrators to a high job-placement rate for the youth being assisted," says Bernadette Seward, communications officer for the public affairs branch of Employment and Immigration.

"A recent audit of KYTES demonstrates their success rate was only 36 per cent so we cannot continue — particularly in a time of fiscal restraint — to fund a program that offers that kind of return on our investment."

Seward added that the cost per participant in KYTES is almost double what was promised, because of a lower-than-expected job placement rate.

"KYTES had an agreement with the federal government to help 36 severely disadvantaged youth to get jobs with the total cost per placement being $12,381," she says. "Instead, a recent audit of the program shows the cost is $26,667 per placement."

Seward says her department is obligated, as a responsible organization representing taxpayers, to cease the funding of the program.

But Dickens says Seward's department hasn't taken into account that today's job market is a tough one.

"Our mandate is to provide people basic jobs skills. (The federal government) hasn't succeeded after leaving KYTES. It's the fact that in general, a high percentage of youth are not employed."

Ron Crockford, Metro Toronto Councillor for the local branch of Employment and Immigration, says the department's job-creation program has been successful in the past two years.

"Our problem is efficiency and effectiveness of the program," says Crockford. "It has to do with the date of vision and what is in line with what we want to do."

Crockford says he is concerned with getting the workforce, while the KYTES program is very socially disadvantaged, the value of respon-

"I was a spoiled brat. My friend's parents would be away. I'd go over Friday night. We'd raid their wine cellar. We'd steal mickys from the liquor store. We'd get what ever we could. First I started staying out overnight, then two nights, then half a week. We'd also do a lot of experimenting with drugs and alcohol and over time we were doing a lot."

Brent Patterson is a spokesman for the John Howard Society, an agency which helps individuals who have been, or could be, in trouble with the law. He believes KYTES is a program which helps keep such people out of trouble.

In a letter to Employment and Immigration Minister Bernard Valcourt, Patterson noted that six out of eight job-training programs for youth have been cut in Metropolitan Toronto since 1989 and funding for the remaining programs has been reduced each year.

"It is our contention that if additional money is not spent on youth employment programs, more money will be spent in other areas, including unemployment insurance, social assistance, health and welfare and correctional services," the letter reads.

But Seward says her department already has a Specialized Youth Unit, an office in Toronto which is committed to the problems of disadvantaged kids.

She says it is responsible for many youth programs but could not say how many, and was unable to confirm how many employment skills programs for youth there are in Toronto right now.

"We are not cutting funding for (disadvantaged youth)," she says. "We are merely discontinuing KYTES' funding for the reasons already mentioned."

Crockford says Toronto has six or seven programs which prepare youths for the job market, but these are not strictly for street youth or youth dealing with addiction problems like KYTES.

"There are different needs inherent in addiction problems which are incompatible with employment programming," he says. "I'm not sure any employment program would take on alcohol or drug problems. Our mandate is to put people in the workforce and we expect to achieve this end."

When asked how the government is helping street kids, Seward said organizations like the Specialized Youth Unit are currently looking at "options."

While KYTES is determined to stick around, the federal cut is going to hurt the program. Right now, Dickens and KYTES' alumni are working to raise funds so they can start fresh in September.

KYTES had taken over the site of an abandoned night club and renovated it, adding a theatre, kitchen, classroom, woodshop, office and lobby. Now it will no longer be able to afford this space.

KYTES will be moving at the end of the month to a smaller space which is being rented to them at a discount. Dickens is looking for another space to house the project in September.

The KYTES staff has now been reduced from five to two people. But to Dickens, the most crucial loss is the ability to offer wages to the youths in the program.

"It used to be that youths who worked for KYTES were able to come off of welfare because we were able to pay them minimum wage," he says. "Without the payroll, the basic motivation for youths to show up every day is gone. Being there is a job skill we are trying to teach and this is harder than it sounds when (they've) never had a job or a routine or a home."

It was a coincidence that I love theatre and the program uses theatre as a tool to get a group to work together. The whole concept really worked for me. I've learned life skills like communication, how to do a resume, how to hunt for a job. I earned three school credits and I've made friends I still have today. I finished KYTES and went back to school. Half a year later I left the group home and moved back in with my parents. Our relationship is a lot better. Now I live on my own, I've got a great place and I've just been accepted into the University of Toronto. It's the transitional year program — pre-university courses but I am considered a university student. I am still using KYTES. There are people here to give me advice. They are not trying to push their opinions down my throat — no religion. It's just a place, my place to do whatever I want really. I'm still on welfare and I will be on OSAP. They don't discriminate against me because of that."

Despite having their government funding pulled, KYTES members have not relented in pursuing other means of support.

"We're not going to give up," says Clouse. "We're not going to let a lousy funding cut beat us."

KYTES recently held an "awareness show" called CUT THIS. The posters advertising the show feature a fist with its index finger raised.

"We are trying to make it clear that we are here to stay by raising funds, and we are quite excited about what we've done," says Dickens. "We have already raised a quarter of our budget for next year by approaching corporations, and asking our other sources of funding to increase the amount of their donations."

He says at full strength KYTES' annual budget was $600,000. His revised annual budget is $275,000.

Right now, Dickens says he is looking at creative ways to make up for these losses, such as getting some of the alumni to volunteer.

Some KYTES alumni are already involved with the funding drive, and took the time to travel to Ottawa to attend the protest on Parliament Hill.

Although it is unable to meet the quota for employed alumni, KYTES seems to have achieved its goal with Katrin Clouse. She not only "gives a sh!t" about her life, but she cares enough to volunteer her time to help the program that helped her.

Although Clouse is mad at the government for cutting the funding to the KYTES program, she says the spirit of KYTES will not be defeated.

As for the rally on Parliament Hill, Clouse says she was disappointed because the only solidarity she found was people blaming the government for their problems, instead of focusing on solutions.

If the goal of KYTES is to give its members a sense of being responsible so that they can function in the jobs Employment and Immigration insists they find, it has succeeded for Katrin Clouse.

She feels people and organizations like KYTES, have to start taking the responsibility to find the answers to their dilemmas.

"If I have a problem," she says "I'll do what I can and not yell at someone else to do it for me."

Tories run wild at Ottawa convention

by Angie Gallop, Arn Keeling and Andrea Smith
The Tory Spies

National leadership conventions, such as the Progressive Conservative gathering in Ottawa June 9-13, have the reputation of being huge parties.

With that in mind — and nagging doubts about the ability of Tories to really party — The Charlatan sent three intrepid reporters into the fray June 12, the night before voting.

Saturday, June 12, 10:15 p.m.

That day, Jean Charest delivered a fiery speech at the Civic Centre eclipsing the other candidates, including front-runner Kim Campbell. After the speeches and the hoopla, delegates piled into buses and headed out for late-night partying.

Kim Campbell held her bash at the Ottawa Congress Centre, featuring Much Music video screens and tables stocked with B.C. salmon.

However, as we arrived, we were nearly stampeded by Campbell youth delegates escaping the building. Inside, the reason was apparent: huge video screens showed Bob Seger wheezing away at "Old Time Rock and Roll," the tables were scraped clean of salmon and beer prices were $3.95 per cup.

Beating a hasty retreat, we rambled across the interprovincial bridge to Hull, where live music and revved-up delegates at the Jean Charest party awaited.

Saturday, June 12, 11:32 p.m.

The Museum of Civilization hosted

Jean and Michele Charest schmoozed heartily at the best of the Tory bashes.

Charest's bash; the irony of seeing braying Tories surrounded by exquisite Native totems and stunning architecture was not lost on us.

At the Charest function, the beer flowed steadily — only two bucks a cup — and the delegates hungrily grazed on oft-replenished veggie trays.

As we settled in for the festivities — featuring several singers and bands including Big Sugar and Sue Medley — we noticed more and more yellow Jim Edwards shirts popping up in the crowd. It was obvious who else's party, besides Campbell's, had died.

But even though the ultra-cool Big Sugar was on stage, Tory organizers had them cranking out old Rolling Stones' and Doors' tunes. Later the crowd was subjected to the revolting Dan Gallagher whipping himself into a frenzy and cheering for Charest.

There was no mistaking the Tory party's demographics, as the white and well-heeled patrolled the floor. There were more minorities on stage performing than there were among the throng.

Although drinking and dancing seemed to be big on the itinerary, a much subtler party agenda became apparent. Back-slapping in the beer line was common as delegates from other camps were recruited by eager Charest supporters.

"So, those hours in our office paid off after all," one Charest delegate was overheard saying as another delegate flashed him a Charest badge.

Some Tories had their fun paid for; those delegates sporting pins saying "I'm undecided: buy me a drink" never had empty beer cups.

Most of the time the parties — like the whole convention — resembled a university frosh week as delegates from opposite camps engaged in cheering wars and drinking. There was even a fight in the Civic Centre's stands between a Charest delegate and a Campbell supporter.

Sunday, June 13, 1:08 a.m.

As the crowd began to mellow and the beer cups were swept away, the awful realization hit us: despite railing against the deficit with all the zeal of fundamentalist preachers, the Progressive Conservatives are, like those same preachers, subject to primal human behaviour and were willing to spend a bundle to celebrate that fact. □

Funding for universities to be cut

Ontario universities react to the NDP's social contract

The Ontario government's 1993 budget and its social contract initiative are cutting into the Carleton university budget, to the tune of $9.4 million dollars (see page 3).

Carleton, however, is not alone — Ontario universities stand to lose $118 million dollars this year from the social contract.

Following are stories on how other universities are dealing with the fiscal reality imposed on them by the provincial NDP government.

by David T. Cole

The Brock Press, Brock University, St. Catherine's

Brock University's administration is preparing itself for a financial crunch to the tune of at least $2 million dollars in the wake of announced provincial government cutbacks.

Ontario NDP treasurer Floyd Laughren finalized cutbacks on May 20 that would cut its total expenditures by $4 billion, with another $2 billion in cuts to be negotiated with the public sector.

Under the plan, transfer payments to universities and colleges will be cut by $92 million in the 1993-94 fiscal year.

Seventy-five per cent of Brock's funding comes from government grants and each one per cent cut represents a $450,000 loss to Brock. General operating grants to universities are slated for a 0.8 per cent cut.

"I do not argue there is a need to get government expenditures under control but I believe cuts to the educational system are putting the future of the province on the table," said Dr. Terrence White, Brock University president.

Despite very serious financial implications facing the university, White remains firm on his commitment that no personnel will be laid off in the 1993-94 year.

"We will make our necessary reductions in areas other than permanent employees," he said.

But White said the news was not as good for students.

"As the situation stands now, its looking like there will be student fee hikes," said White. □

by John Ludic

The Ontario, Guelph University, Guelph

Despite opposition from the Canadian Federation of Students — Ontario (CFS-O) and the province's university professors, the NDP government will go ahead with its cuts to higher education.

Budget 1993 will cut deeply into the Ministry of Education and Training. The NDP's social contract to cut public service employees' wages and benefits alone will sever $52 million from colleges and $118 million from universities.

The University of Guelph will also lose about $3 million in annual grants.

"Budget 1993 demonstrates the NDP government's incessant refusal to stand by its social policies," said CFS-O chair Ken Craft.

"Bob Rae's government has once again successfully undermined its commitment to Ontario's college and university students."

Saul Ross, president of the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations (OCUFA), said cuts to higher education will hurt students and the economic recovery.

He said there is a "consensus about the need for higher education in the labor market; increasingly, new jobs will require post-secondary education."

Ross said it will be harder for poor and working-class students to get access to the dwindling number of post-secondary spaces.

He also said OCUFA predicts increasing class sizes, reduced or eliminated programs, and cuts to libraries, facilities and support services. □

The Variety, University of Toronto

Toronto (CUP) — Faculty at Ontario's colleges and universities were the first public employees to abandon the social contract talks on June 3.

Later that day, the rest of the public sector unions joined them, voting unanimously to reject the province's final proposal.

The so-called social contract included negotiations on the province's proposal to cut payroll costs by $2 billion.

Staff and faculty representatives said the talks represented a threat to traditional collective bargaining.

Normally, the Ministry of Colleges and Universities gives each institution a lump sum, with each school then working out wage agreements with its unions.

The social contract proposed opening up all these agreements simultaneously and modifying them as a group.

"We (the staff) have a collective agreement with the administration," said Bill Graham, president of the U of T faculty association, who represented the university at the talks. "We do not expect them to arbitrarily abrogate it."

John Malcolm, president of the U of T staff association, was also part of the negotiating team. He expressed scepticism at the government promise of alternate employment for laid-off staff.

"You tell me where 'suitable vacancies' exist if you're already laying off thousands of people," he said.

Nor did Malcolm see any hope for achieving any compromise on job security, his union's main demand.

"With security guaranteed, we would have looked for ways to reduce costs," he said. □ not there is a real need among students. Students with summer jobs or whose parents are paying their fees may not be included in low-income statistics, she says.

"(The report) is just another measure of poverty, an accurate one," says Greene.

But Francois Dumaine, acting director for the National Anti-Poverty Organization, says the report was not accurate at all.

"They (the committee members) are trying to sidetrack from poverty," said Dumaine.

He says his organization withdrew from the committee last year because it felt Barbara Greene was pushing an agenda to "redefine" poverty rather than fight it.

Dumaine says the exemption of students from poverty statistics shows how insensitive the committee is to poverty.

"It marginalizes the reality of many Canadians," he says.

In fact, Dumaine says, student poverty is on the rise.

"We've seen a very big increase in the number of food banks on university campuses across the country," he says.

Charron says the CFS does not keep statistics on the numbers of students living below the low-income cutoff or otherwise in poverty.

The report's recommendations are now being reviewed by various government committees and won't be adopted until after the next election, providing the Tories are re-elected, said Greene.

Charron says the CFS won't lobby against the report until after it has finished fighting the upcoming election. □

Baa, Baa councillors. Have you any spine?

It seems CUSA councillors are a bunch of sheep, and if we're not careful, we could all get sheared.

At the CUSA council meeting on Monday, June 21, this became as clear as the blatant apathy of the councillors was apparent. Although the agenda called it the third "official" meeting of CUSA, things were about as unofficial as you could get.

Councillors spent over an hour bickering over the fine details of giving $500 to the campus mediation centre, $500 to a student going on a development project in Costa Rica, and about $1,900 to send two students to a conference about disabilities in the United States.

Grand total: $2,943.36.

They then passed the 1993-94 capital budget in eleven minutes, asking only a handful of questions.

Grand total: $106,717.56.

Councillors seemed to know everything about the finer points of CUSA finance when discussing outside requests for money, but when finance commissioner René Faucher presented his capital budget for approval, it was passed with hardly a whimper.

If these are the people responsible for overseeing CUSA's $2.2 million budget this year, I want out.

While every item in the capital budget may be perfectly legitimate, it is foolish of council to just accept the executive's actions without question. It is the duty of councillors not only to represent their constituents, but to act as a check on the executive. Last time we checked councillors' election promises, none of them said they'd act as a rubber stamp of approval for the finance commissioner.

So let's see some action — and responsibility. This doesn't mean councillors have to go for the jugulars of all executive members, but it does mean they should examine what goes on a little more closely. We elected these people to think, not sit in silence and piss $100,000 of our money away without question.

Everyone makes mistakes or bad choices. Executive members are only human. They are bound to make mistakes, and mistakes can be expensive.

If councillors are on their toes, they can catch these mistakes. There are lots of ways to act as a check on the executive. Ask questions. Why do we need a $30,000 contingency fund (for unplanned expenses that come up during the year)? Do we really need a $13,000 electronic billboard? Does Faucher really need $750 for a new set of blinds?

Councillors should be asking questions and doing their research (like looking at last year's capital budget). And the executive should be giving councillors every opportunity to ask these questions too. The budget was put out for councillors to pick up Monday morning, the day of the meeting. CUSA vice-president internal Rob Jaimeson says he had copies of the budget on Friday, if someone had asked him for one.

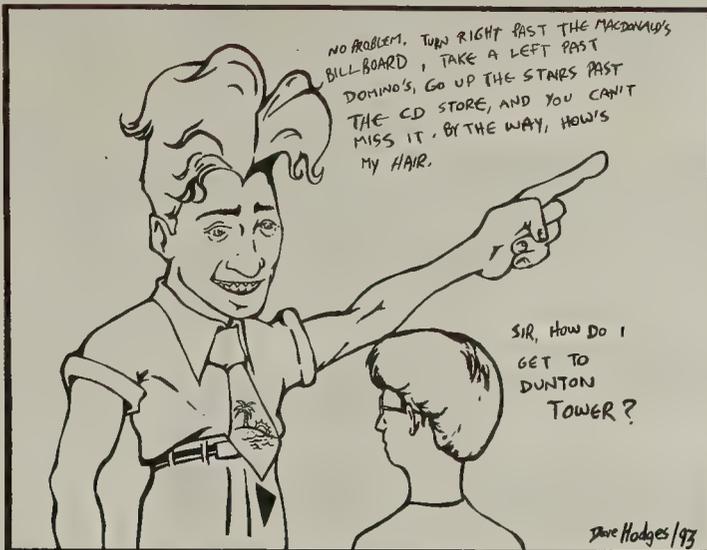

At least one councillor, John Edwards, didn't get the budget until Monday afternoon. The meeting was Monday night. This clearly isn't enough time to go through such an important document with a fine-tooth comb.

After passing the capital budget with such speed, council then adjourned for what was supposed to be a 10-minute break. However, some councillors and members of the executive didn't come back after 10 minutes. With just a few councillors needed to make quorum after the break and more than half an agenda left to go, council chair Dave Gregory quickly adjourned the meeting.

Guess that's what happens when you let someone become council chair who, as the vice-president internal, wanted to abolish CUSA council two years ago.

If this is the pattern that is being set for the year, we're all in trouble. We don't need meetings that end halfway down the agenda, shelving council business that has been hanging around since April 30. We don't need councillors that can spend more than $106,000 without batting an eye.

Too bad we didn't get to item 26 on the agenda, a "poor attendance" motion. KJ

OPINION

Allowed to be proud?

by Tim Riordan

Riordan is a director of the Association of Lesbians and Gays of Ottawa.

Ottawa Mayor Jacquelin Holzman has made yet another political blunder.

Earlier in the spring, the mayor was asked to officially proclaim Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual (GLB) Pride Week, June 11-20.

This was not an unusual request. The only difference from last year's proclamation is that she was asked to include bisexuals.

After considerable delay, Holtzman issued the proclamation declaring Gay and Lesbian Pride Week at the beginning of June but specifically refused to include bisexuals. Despite vocal protest from the GLB community and city councillors Diane Holmes and Mark Maloney, Holtzman has stubbornly refused to change her narrow mind.

This decision is an insult to the GLB community at large and to its bisexual members in particular. Holtzman is not in a position to determine who is a member of the GLB community. This is a decision we have already made for ourselves.

Gay and lesbian members of the GLB Pride Week Committee have already acknowledged the presence and contribution of bisexual people by changing the names of the committee and the week earlier this spring to include them.

By refusing to include bisexuals, the mayor is forcing city taxpayers to finance her prejudice.

Michael Smith, the chief human rights officer for the City of Ottawa, has repeatedly called on the mayor to issue a new proclamation which includes bisexuals. He has stated that "failure to do so could leave the city vulnerable to a complaint under the Ontario Human Rights Code," because Holtzman's actions constitute discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

Douglas Wallace, the city solicitor, has also advised the mayor to change her mind.

If the desired proclamation is not forthcoming, Bill Hunter, the Pride Week Committee chair, has indicated that a formal complaint will be filed with the Ontario Human Rights Commission.

Defending against a human rights inquiry is a costly process, so even if the mayor's actions are not found to be discriminatory, as they likely will be, thousands of tax dollars will be wasted on legal fees.

Mayor Holzman displayed poor judgment in refusing to include bisexuals in her Pride Week proclamation. However, the manner in which she and her staff have handled the resulting controversy is an unqualified disgrace.

Holtzman has refused repeated requests to meet with representatives of the GLB community. Her staff have not returned calls and have not been able to provide a reason for her decision.

It is about time that the mayor swallowed both her pride and her bias and behaved in a manner which is consistent with the provisions of the Ontario Human Rights Code, which clearly outlaws discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

As a woman, Holtzman should bear in mind that she is a member of a group that has traditionally been subject to discrimination. It is ironic that having rising to a position of authority, she would now refuse to assist the efforts of another group to free themselves from discrimination. **□

Despite the runaround, the GLB community marched on for Pride Week.

The winning power of black

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

Image.

They say it's everything. And judging by recent trends in the competitive world of professional sports, whoever they are, they're right.

Because in the never-ending search for that elusive winning edge, more and more sports teams are dressing their players in black. And it's paying dividends.

Just consider which major league teams have been winners in recent years. The Pittsburgh Penguins. The Chicago Bulls. Even the Los Angeles Kings almost made it this year. Winners wear black.

Then, imagine the trendiest and most fashionable organizations in any major league. Odds are that they too worship at the black jersey altar.

"Black has this rebellious appeal."

Dr. Luc Pelletier

Black

The Los Angeles Raiders of the National Football League was the first team to wear a black uniform. It made them look tough. It made them talk tough. And when they get on the field, it made them play tough.

"The Raiders are the ones that started it all," says sports psychologist Tom O'Hara, commenting on the rise of black in team uniforms. "They were successful and they had that pirate image. They were known as a tough, never-stop team."

Other professional sports teams have followed suit on the black fashion bandwagon: baseballs American League Chicago White Sox, the expansion club Miami Heat and Orlando Magic of the National Basketball Association. Even the Ottawa Rough Riders of the Canadian Football League have gone from uniforms trimmed in black to those dominated by it.

But nowhere has this trend toward black uniforms grown faster than in the National Hockey League. During the 1970s, only the Boston Bruins sported black road uniforms. Now, one quarter of NHL teams are sporting road uniforms dominated by black — Vancouver, Los Angeles, Pittsburgh, Boston, Minnesota and our hometown Ottawa Senators.

Black.

According to psychologists, it is a color that may promote aggression.

"It is possible," says Dr. Luc Pelletier, a professor of psychology at the University of Ottawa who dabbles in sports psychology. "Some people do associate black with aggressive behavior," he says.

"It's a stereotype, a belief that we associate black with bad things. Villains for example, are always black in movies. Black is always the color used to identify these people. What's happened is that the association has been transferred to other settings and activities."

O'Hara agrees.

"Black has this rebellious appeal," he says. A black leather jacket, for example, has this outlaw image and that appeals to younger kids. It's a way for them to 80, had the same ownership, same players and coaches before and after the switch, but their penalty minutes went up.

In the 35 games after the switch, the Penguins averaged 12 minutes per game in penalties, a 50 per cent increase over the eight they had averaged when they wore blue.

Black.

It's more than just an aggressive mind-game advantage. It's also an image statement.

According to fashion design experts, black is a color of power.

"Black is a very dramatic color," says Brenda Alldritt, a fashion design instructor with the Ottawa campus of the Toronto School of Business. "Only people who are very confident about themselves will wear black. It's a stated look that can give you an added air of confidence."

Black is a classic look, she says, and that's what makes it so popular.

"It's a timeless fashion that will never go out of style. It's this basic shade that will get you a lot of wear because it goes well with everything."

Other Ottawa fashion designers agree. "It's a very elegant color," says fashion coordinator Keith Charles of the fashion design program at Algonquin College.

"It's also versatile. You can coordinate it with anything. Doesn't matter what you match it with, it will work. It's also very wearable. You can wear a black garment many times over before it will show dirt, if it will show dirt at all."

Because of the strong fashion state-identify with their sports heroes."

Studies also support the association of black with aggression.

At Cornell University during the mid-80s, psychologist Thomas Gilovich conducted a study testing the theory that black-clad teams in football and hockey received more penalties than those not wearing dark-colored uniforms.

His study, using statistics from 1970 to 1986, showed that the five NHL teams with black uniforms were penalized more than the league average in all but one of the 17 seasons examined.

"(Black) makes them look like winners. And if they look like winners, they'll play like winners."

Brenda Alldritt

In hockey, the five teams with black in their uniforms had higher average penalty minutes in each of the 17 seasons and ranked first, second, third, sixth and 10th during the seasons combined.

While many factors like player personnel or coaching could account for these high penalty figures, Gilovich found one case that dispelled these possibilities.

The Pittsburgh Penguins, who switched from blue to black in mid-season 1979-ment black makes, both Charles and Alldritt say it's quite probable that many sports teams changed over to black because of the fashion element involved.

"It makes them look like winners," says Alldritt. "And if they look like winners, they'll play like winners."

Too bad some of the red, white and black Ravens don't follow suit. □

Thumbs down (or maybe we should say pants down) to the Oxford University rowing crew. According to a recent blurb in the Ottawa Citizen, the team got caught rowing in the nude two weeks ago by police. After a late-night drinking session, eight oarsmen took to the water. Their coach, also nude, rode his bicycle along the towpath shouting instructions, police said. Their jaunt on the River Isis was finally halted after three kilometres when a lockmaster, awakened by the revelry, called police.

"I could not believe my eyes when I saw the lads completely naked and obviously the worse for drink," said lockmaster John Chandler. □

Coreene Smith always understood that penalties were part of hockey. But she never expected to be penalized for being a woman.

Three years ago Smith was successful in goalie tryouts for her Sault Ste. Marie high-school team but was refused playing time by the high-school men's athletic association.

She took her case to the Ontario Human Rights Commission. That case was due to be heard later this month but a settlement has been reached.

The association has agreed to include statements in all its published material declaring membership on its sports teams is open to both sexes. Smith was also paid $2,500 in general damages.

"I'm very happy with the agreement," said Smith, now a 21-year-old psychology student at Bishop's University in Lennoxville, Que.

"It was a long, three stressful years, but the issue had to be addressed." □

Lussier's helmet-first tackle broke Dunn's jaw, caused a concussion and hospitalized the Raven for nine days.

Lussier was suspended for the remainder of the season by the University of Ottawa. That suspension was later extended to four years by the Ontario Quebec Interuniversity Football Conference after Carleton protested the penalty was too light.

Lussier appealed the suspension and Ottawa lawyer Kelly was asked by the OQIFC to determine if the penalty was reasonable. □

RANT 'N' RAVEN

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

After an unprecedented 24th Stanley Cup, an impressive 16-4 playoff run, after Stickgate and the Forum ghosts, after 10 straight overtime wins and 11 victories by one goal — there can only be one explanation for the Montreal Canadiens' hockey success.

The Devil.

Now, stop laughing. Think about it and consider the following. First, why is it that almost half the team's players have diabolical-sounding names? Denis, Dionne, Desjardins, DePietro, Demers, Devil. It's clear these men have sold their souls to Satan in return for a drink from the Cup. And who's the most damned of them all? Scoring leader Vincent Damphousse, that's who. Look at his name. Damphousse. Translated it reads "House of the Damned."

Secondly, what better way is there to explain the goaltending of Patrick Roy? Certainly no ordinary mortal could have played so well without a little demonic sorcery. Pundits claim Roy is a pillar of concentration in pressure situations. And they're right. Because when the game is on the line, Roy just tunes into Lucifer's private play-by-play broadcast and knows exactly what the opposition is going to do before they do it. Must be pretty hard to blow a save with that kind of color commentary.

Next, how else can one explain the hellish grin that flared up on coach Jacques Demers's face as he called for an illegal stick measurement on Marty McSorley in game two of the finals. Well, when your head scout is Satan himself, you can be pretty damn sure his information will be correct. One can only imagine how hard it must be not to keep a straight face with that kind of secret under wraps.

Then there's the issue of captain Guy Carbonneau. With 15 seconds left to play in game three and King forwards Tony Granato and Robert Rychel wreaking havoc around the net, Carbonneau covered the puck with a gloved hand in his own crease preventing a goal. A sure penalty. Except to referee Terry Gregson who ruled it a stoppage in play. Makes you wonder who's back pocket he's in, doesn't it?

Finally there's the damning evidence of Wayne Gretzky. The greatest hockey player this world has ever seen lost a Stanley Cup final. It's unimaginable. Until you realize all his God-given talent never really had a chance against the demonic powers of Beelzebub. An incredibly talented athlete against a god. David versus Goliath. Only it's no contest when you realize Goliath has the sling. Had I known earlier, I would have bet my life savings on the Devil as well.

They say the Forum is a shrine. And so it is. But not to hockey. It's an altar and breeding ground for lost spirits looking to sell their souls in exchange for a drink from Lord Stanley's Cup. And that's exactly what the Montreal Canadiens did this year. They sold their souls to the demon overlord and bought a one-way ticket to hell. □

Avoiding individuality

Avoiding Architecture

June 10 & 11
Gallery 101

You too can learn to be a Queen!"

So began Avoiding Architecture, a two-man show written by Andrew Griffin. The two men in question are Carl Stewart, who portrayed a flamboyant homosexual, and keyboardist Michael Leon, who provided the background music for the evening.

This radical but hilarious play featured Stewart's running monologue about individuality and how modern society appears set on crushing it. In a society which expects conformity, it is understandable how someone belonging to a minority group -- in this case, the homosexual community -- would be aware of this crisis.

As the play's title suggests, Stewart highlighted his argument mainly by referring to architecture. Society, he said, has constructed our personalities to be as purposeful but as bland as the modern buildings we see constructed around us.

It was quite appropriate that he chose to refer to buildings in Ottawa, a city notorious for its conformist and conservative nature.

Along the way, Stewart also touched on many, many other areas that deal with society's repression of individuality. He told how video games, television and billboard ads present us with an artificial reality that not only distracts us from our own thoughts and feelings, but alienates us from them as well.

Although Stewart raised many important concerns throughout, the audience was, at times, overloaded with just too many related issues, all coming one after another. He talked about everything from whales to the debate over same-sex marriages.

After a while, the litany of facts made his performance seem not only radical, but neurotic. Perhaps this is what a success-driven society has caused independent spirits to become.

Fortunately, this intense side was balanced quite skilfully by Stewart's often hilarious performance. His wacky dance interpretations, such as what he thinks of the people who frequent the World Exchange Plaza, were enough to get the audience roaring with laughter.

Songs performed by Stewart and Leon were interspersed throughout the two-hour-long performance. The tunes themselves ranged in quality from tedious to amusing.

The first song, "The Laws of God, the Laws of Man," is a poem by A.E. Houseman about how we are unfairly judgmental of others, using our own standards or those set for us by society. Although it is a remarkably beautiful and passionate poem, its nature was drained by Leon's lifeless and dull reproduction of it.

More successful was Stewart's tune, "Success Has Made a Failure of Our Homos." This song, which describes how modern society's workaholic ethic has robbed us of time we need to spend building rewarding relationships, is something many couples -- both homosexual and heterosexual -- can relate to.

The play's backdrop was a huge slide screen featuring images pertaining to other of real whales at home in the ocean. His point? Safe replicas of nature obscure the fact that we are destroying the whales and their environment.

Some slides were as entertaining as Stewart himself. The most memorable of these were the ones where Stewart and his friends took on the Rideau Centre dressed in drag during the Christmas shopping season.

In the mall, they distributed pamphlets in the mall that offered to "Give men a makeover and let women take over." According to Stewart, they were a big hit with the women in the mall's fashion and cosmetic stores.

The evening ended with a question period that gave the audience a chance to converse with Griffin, Stewart and Leon. Here, Stewart explained how, for him, the definition for the word "faggot" could well be expanded beyond one's sexual orientation to refer to anyone who is an individual.

"I know some straight people who are better faggots than we are," Stewart told the audience.

So when he kicked off the show with the line, "You too can learn to be a Queen," he was not offering a lesson on homosexuality, but rather a lesson in individuality. □

Seattle forefathers Push onward

by Tim Pryor
Charlatan Staff

Don't accuse Seattle sludge rockers Gruntruck of capitalizing off the recent explosion of that city's music scene. The quartet is a combination of scene veterans who have paid their dues.

Vocalist Ben McMillan and drummer Norman Scott both played with Seattle forefathers Skin Yard, and are joined by ex-Napalm Beach bassist Tim Paul and guitarist Tom Niemeyer of The Accused. They have been touring non-stop since the October release of their latest album, Push.

After the excellent dirge-fest Inside Yours on eMpTy records in 1990, Roadrunner Records signed Gruntruck and re-released the album nearly two years later. Produced by Skin Yard guitarist and producer Jack Endino (Mudhoney, Nirvana, TAD), the album combines elements of Skin Yard and early Soundgarden.

However, Niemeyer says Push is a better example of the band's capabilities.

"We had live performances under our belt after we did Inside Yours -- we giggered around here and there. This solidified what we were after, because Inside Yours was a real big experiment. On Push we acted more like a band; it was more focused."

A tour with Screaming Trees and Alice in Chains last fall helped expose Gruntruck to a more mainstream audience.

"That tour really helped us. A lot of people hadn't heard of Gruntruck. We made a lot of really good friends, and they're all coming back (to see us this time around)," says Niemeyer.

Montreal was one of his favorite spots on that tour.

"Ben and I stayed up all night and were walking around Montreal, drunk off our asses, and there were all these people hanging out, who probably didn't even care about rock and roll, and we put them on the guest list.

"It was great because all these street people came to the show. We bought them all drinks and gave them food. However, that show wasn't a really good example of how tight we can be, because we were drinking all day and night."

In the spirit of promotion, Gruntruck made a video for "Tribe," the first single off the new album, but Niemeyer says it wasn't a pleasant experience.

"The video for 'Tribe' didn't really come out as we wanted it," he says. "After doing 'Tribe,' I never wanted to do videos again. It was like having a really bad relationship and then hating all women because of one girl."

"But the video for 'Crazy Love' (the next single) is totally cool. We got this guy who has all this knowledge and these great ideas. He really brought out the personality of the band."

Gruntruck will be on the road for the next seven months. Following the conquest of the masses, they'll begin work on their next album. □

1 . . . The Trio's Back in Black

by David Bartolf
Charlatan Staff

Good news for Black Boot Trio lovers: you can expect new stuff from the local hard country cowpokes very soon. According to Steve Fai, vocalist, guitarist and songwriter for the four-year-old group, the Trio plans to finish recording and mixing the presently untitled 12-song CD by the end of July and release it in the fall.

There will be a few differences between this effort and the Trio's first release, the cassette Everything's Gonna Be Alright. The songs on the first cassette were basically recorded just as they sounded live.

"Now we're going through a bit of rewriting and rearranging," says Fai. "That's quite a difference to take that extra time and to use the studio to do a bit of writing."

In addition, says Fai, the replacement of original bassist Susan Gemmell with John Kanakis will give the new album a more energetic, rock sound. Guest player David Frenlin adds bagpipes in "John's Song." Ending the CD is a gospel song — "perfect for a country station," according to Fai.

Touring figures prominently in the Trio's plans. Fai, Kanakis and drummer Steffany Bennett are planning a swing through Eastern Canada to round off the summer.

This summer, Fai wanted to tour Western Canada, his old stomping grounds, but time constraints and financial concerns related to recording the album has put that on hold.

"We were hoping for a spot at the Winnipeg Folk Festival," says Fai. "That was going to be our hinge for the Western tour."

With typical Prairie optimism his reaction is simply "next year." Expecting to shore up financing by then, the Trio should make the usual tour stops: Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver.

As you may be able to gather from the music, Fai hails from Beinfait, Sask. Of course, there was the country music influence, courtesy of country station CJSL in nearby Estevan.

"Listened to Johnny Cash and Johnny Horton non-stop when I was growing up," Fai laughs.

Black Boot Trio is not Fai's first group. He used to be part of a band that did some touring in Saskatchewan and Alberta. It "wasn't going anywhere," so he concentrated on songwriting for a few years and moved to Ottawa in 1985 to get his degree in architecture at Carleton University. By day, Fai, 34, is a sessional professor at Carleton.

Right now, says Fai, "(I'm) playing more than I ever have, and working harder at it."

(The Trio will be playing a Canada Day matinee at Zaphod's. They are also playing a Plug! celebration at Creeque Alley on Aug. 7 with Age of Faith and Evil Knieval.)

With the recent release of their Brit pop-influenced CD Ulysses, Ottawa's Fishtales is stepping out at last into the limelight.

Bassist Daniel Boivin, guitarist and vocalist Dave Draves and drummer Michel Trottier are enjoying extensive airplay on the two local campus stations.

They've also attracted the attention of Toronto's alternative FM station, CFNY.

Fishtales is one of many Ottawa bands who have released CDs in the past year. Ulysses, true to that indie spirit, was released independently by the band.

"It really surprises me, in a place like Ottawa, how many bands have CDs out," remarks Draves. "Let's face it, rarely are those bands making back their money, except through live shows and stuff like that. It's really hard now, it really is."

Still, Draves is quick to note how the Ottawa scene has grown.

"You think (back to) about a year ago, and you look at how many acts most people knew about in town, and it was nothing, with the exception of Furnaceface, and now it seems like even radio people are talking about bands that have just done everything themselves."

Fishtales has demonstrated it has what it takes to remain afloat in the local independent band scene. Beginning six years ago as the Boys Next Door, the band survived losing and regaining members to finally emerge three years later as Fishtales.

The band is currently trying to get as many out-of-town gigs as it can. In the immediate future, they hope to play around Guelph and London, Ont. They're also hoping to take off on a national tour later in July. This is all part of a grand scheme to promote Fishtales as much as possible.

"Now is the time that we have to follow up the CD, and I think the video will hit just about the right time for when we are on tour across the country," says Draves. The video, which is all set to go, now waits for the nation's music station to show it.

"I really hope Much Music will give it more than an indie spin, because it seems like indie stuff is only played on Friday nights. Whatever, I'm really hoping we'll get light rotation or something."

Here it is, the long-awaited showcase of Ottawa's rock scene.

The compilation has both quantity and quality. It's 74 minutes long and every one of the 23 tracks is a winner.

The collection itself is a mix of new and old. The tracks by the Skatterbrains, Furnaceface and Mystic Zealots are well-known standards we've heard before at their gigs. A few others, like "Angel" and "John's Song," both by Black Boot Trio, preview upcoming record releases.

Marty Jones, keyboardist for local funkster-anarchists Furnaceface, produced the music. He shares credit with Ian Tamblin on Fun For Malakai's dreamy tunes and Paul Sheridan on Black Boot Trio's hard-driving country and western tunes.

All the groups — including MS Gesus, Uncommon Society, Age of Faith, Evil Knieval and Fishtales — have put forward two of their best songs. By the sound of the album and the humorous liner notes, they had a lot of fun recording it. Neanderthal Sponge is the lone contributor of three songs. Their song "Hoveltown" sure beats Andrew Cash's "Boom Town" of a few years back.

I could only find one drawback to the album. Furnaceface tunes don't seem as lively as one would expect, maybe because they've been performed live so many times.

CUSA mum on SAAB dismissal

by Franco D'Orazio
Charlatan staff

A former employee of the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) claims he was fired because he was attempting to unionize other CUSA employees.

Wayne Ross told The Charlatan he was dismissed as co-ordinator of the Student Academic Action Bureau (SAAB) on July 16 without any indication as to why.

"They (CUSA's executive director Kelly Mounse and director of academics Gary Anandasangaree) gave me a letter informing me that I was dismissed, but no reason was given to me," said Ross. He said Anandasangaree and Mounse told him they would not give him a reason "unless a lawyer was present."

CUSA officials are unwilling to discuss the matter. "Our comment is that there is no comment," says CUSA's finance commissioner René Faucher. "All our information has been given to our lawyers, and they will issue a statement if need be."

Ross said he suspects he was fired because he had been attempting to unionize CUSA employees for the last three months. He would not say exactly which employees he had tried to unionize.

Ross had been working as the co-ordinator of SAAB, a CUSA-funded office which provides academic information and advice to students, since May 1.

Reading from minutes he took of a service co-ordinators' meeting on June 9, Ross said when CUSA President Lucy Watson asked him if he was involved in the attempt to organize CUSA employees, he confirmed he was.

Ross says Watson and other members of the CUSA executive were displeased by his response, arguing that the students' association would not be able to afford to have its employees unionized.

Watson, who was away in Maine this week on vacation, says she could not comment because it is a staff-related issue, according to Faucher, who spoke to her over the phone. CUSA refused The Charlatan's request for their minutes of the meeting.

Faucher says council members will be informed next week if any new developments come up.

The issue came up at the last council meeting on July 22 when Peter Nogalo, co-ordinator of the Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Centre, asked why Ross was fired.

"What happened to Wayne Ross?" asked Nogalo, also a CUSA employee.

"He is no longer working here," responded Anandasangaree.

But when Nogalo asked whether Ross was fired and why, Watson intervened and said his question dealt with a sensitive staff-related issue.

Rob Jamieson, CUSA's vice-president internal, then moved for council to go in camera, which allowed Nogalo's question to be answered behind closed doors.

Going in camera is an option often used to protect the parties of a dispute from being sued because, in this case, no one would know the rationale for why Ross was fired.

And when the meeting resumed in open chambers, Nogalo was not permitted to divulge the answer he was given or even say if Ross was fired.

Later, Nogalo told The Charlatan he was not satisfied with the response he was given.

After the council meeting, Watson would not say if Ross was fired. But she conceded he didn't choose to leave after she was told a Charlatan reporter was present just after Ross received his letter of dismissal, when he exclaimed, "I've been canned!"

"No, it wasn't his decision (to leave)," she said. "It was a decision Gary and I made in consultation with the executive." □

OC Transpo jacks up fares, cuts service

by Renata Manchak
Charlatan staff

OC Transpo is raising its fares, leaving some students feeling like they've been taken for a ride.

As of Aug. 1, OC Transpo cash fares will rise to $1.50 from $1.30. A student bus pass will increase by $1 to $43.50 and Para Transpo will require customers to meet new eligibility guidelines to reduce its service demands. Riders who pay with bus tickets will still pay $1.30 for an off-peak ride.

Service will also be reduced on holidays such as New Year's Day and Christmas Day, when bus routes will drop to hourly service just before Christmas.

The changes don't please fourth-year psychology student Joy Belvett.

"It's total bullshit. This town seems to not support its students at all."

Third-year geography student Megan Dodds doesn't like the increases either.

"The last thing off-campus students who are struggling to make ends meet need is to worry about giving OC Transpo more money."

Tamara Feick, a third-year English student, calls the fare increases "ridiculous."

"An increase in ridership would be more profitable than an increase in fares. Students should be eligible for reduced fares. Students shouldn't have to spend their OSAP on OC Transpo, which is government-funded anyway," she says.

Sheryl Ananny, a co-ordinator at the Carleton Disability Awareness Centre, says the plans for Para Transpo will limit the mobility of people with disabilities, who can call to be picked up and dropped off where they choose.

"This is not a step in the right direction," says Ananny. "There is no alternate mode of transportation for some people. There is no question of legitimacy for normal people. This is an insult to consumers."

Oxana Sawka, director of public relations for OC Transpo, says the Para Transpo service can't keep up with demand.

"Para Transpo has a problem because there has been a 21 per cent increase in ridership, but we've only budgeted for a 10 per cent increase. We will be asking those who use the service more than 70 times a month to reduce their usage. There will be an eligibility review committee established and we will be promoting the easier access facility on normal buses."

Sawka says the "easier access facility" lowers buses to sidewalk level and there are more grab rails for people to hold. Details for the review committee, such as who will be on it and what criteria will be used, have yet to be worked out, says Sawka.

"Para Transpo is on a first-come, first-served basis. If everybody continues to take trips at the rate that they do, then people are going to start getting refused," she says.

While OC Transpo had not planned for an increase in cash fares, the provincial government introduced a tax on auto insurance in the spring which will cost OC Transpo $400,000. Sawka says this is one reason fares are increasing.

Also, Sawka says there hasn't been an increase in 18 months. And with the current fares, OC Transpo wouldn't be able to make their budget target.

Riders who hop on the back of articulated buses without a bus pass or transfer had better watch out, Sawka says.

"OC Transpo will be mounting a campaign against fare evaders, so there will be more inspectors on buses, in order to combat the fare evaders, which are one percent of the riders."

If all fare evaders paid up, they would add an extra $800,000 to OC Transpo coffers every year, she says.

She says bus service to Carleton will increase despite a decrease of service in general. Route 117, which currently runs through Carleton, will be combined with Route 118 and will provide more frequent weekly stops and weekend service to Carleton, says Sawka. Route 117 currently doesn't run on campus on the weekend.

"The Number 19 bus will also be going to Carleton on peak hours starting in September, which will be handy for the students who live in the east or west and use the transitway," says Sawka.

Sawka says the student pass will cost $43.50 as opposed to the $53.00 adult bus pass — a savings of $10. □

CUSA changes locks after Unicentre break-ins

by Alex Bustos and Mario Carlucci

The department of university safety is investigating thefts that took place from three offices in the Unicentre the nights of July 8 and July 13.

Keys were taken from the office of the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) to commit the crimes, says CUSA President Lucy Watson.

Watson says a file was stolen July 8 from Volunteer Bureau office, a service run by CUSA. It contained correspondence between the bureau's co-ordinator Fouad Kanaan, and Theresa Cowan, CUSA's director of services.

"There were documents involving personnel matters pertaining to Theresa Cowan, Lucy Watson and myself. Most of the files were deleted from my diskette," says Kanaan.

Kanaan says he doesn't know of any reason for the theft.

"I don't know why (the correspondence) was stolen. The only reason I can think of is to be used against me, or to get rid of the information."

Cowan says the information stolen from Kanaan's file was about "a unique incident."

Watson says the Women's Centre, another service run by CUSA, was broken into on the same night and a file was tampered with.

Renée Twaddle, co-ordinator of the Women's Centre, says the tampered file was her CUSA file, containing "all correspondence with the CUSA executive, correspondence between CUSA services, and personal notes."

"A personal note was moved from the middle of the file and placed on the inside cover of the folder," says Twaddle.

She says another personal note was stolen from the same file.

"It must have been taken for some reason. People don't steal for no reason," says Twaddle.

Watson says a break-in occurred at the CUSA office on July 13. Fourteen international student identity cards and a file belonging to CUSA's vice-president external were stolen. The cards had a photo of the holder, as well as the holder's name, birthdate and where they go to school.

After the thefts, CUSA changed the locks to its office. It also notified Travel Cuts at Carleton and the University of Ottawa about the stolen cards, says Watson. The cards entitle holders to student discounts, including ones on some fares at the national student travel bureau run by the Canadian Federation of Students.

All people who work in the CUSA office, including members of the executive and the building operations manager, have keys to the office, says Cowan.

Cowan says CUSA has asked for a safety audit from the department of university safety, which will pinpoint areas where CUSA and its services can improve on security, says Cowan. She adds that, for now, CUSA members have been told to be more careful with where they place confidential files and messages.

CUSA hasn't notified the police of the thefts, says Cowan.

Len Boudreault, the assistant director of university safety, could not be reached for comment. □

CUSA to keep renting videos

by Maurice G. Fortier
Charlatan staff

Coke, Snapple and Hires have taken the place of Costner, Schwarzenegger and Heppburn in the Unicentre store.

The Unicentre store's video section is gone for the summer. Coolers for drinks have taken the place of the movies.

The video store was shut down at the end of April due to an anticipated lack of use during the summer, says René Faucher, finance commissioner for CUSA, the undergraduate students' association. CUSA opened the video section last September.

The video venture lost $5,292 last year. Faucher blames this loss on the arrangement the store had with its distributor.

Last year, CUSA paid $5 a month to rent each video for the store and then tried to rent them for $3.49 on weekends or $2.49 on a weeknight.

"What that does is guarantee that for every video in the store, we're paying the rental cost," says Faucher.

"But, at the beginning, it was very hard to get all of the movies rented at least once a month to make up for that."

Faucher says in the fall, the video tapes will be rented on consignment and kept behind the front counter of the Unicentre store. Customers will choose the movie they want to rent from a display and bring a tag to a cashier to get the movie.

By renting on consignment, CUSA will only pay for the movies it rents out.

"On consignment you can't lose money," says Faucher. "If I rent a video for $3.50, I pay (the supplier) $2.50."

Faucher says the consignment system guarantees the store's videos won't lose money next year, even if business is slow.

"If the supplier puts in 200 videos, it doesn't cost me a dime if I don't rent them. They're free."

Faucher says he is also using the consignment method of selling in other areas including Carleton clothing, Orientation and Charity Ball souvenirs and Panda merchandise.

"CUSA is doing that in many areas. We get a percentage of the sales and are not stuck with the inventory," he says. "When you are stuck with all that inventory you are eating the entire cost."

Faucher says he wants to put an end to the game of guessing what is going to sell. By guessing wrong in past years, CUSA has been stuck with products that they can no longer sell, such as outdated Panda shirts, he says.

Last year, CUSA spent about $20,000 on Carleton T-shirts and boxer shorts, but only sold $14,000 worth of this merchandise in the Unicentre store.

Faucher says that even with consignment, CUSA will have a say in the products it sells.

"We have control over quality and prices."

"We don't want to gouge the frosh." □

Protestors slam social contract

by Mario Carlucci and Arn Keeling
Charlatan staff

Some Carleton members of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) and their supporters took their lunch to the administration building July 22 to protest the provincial government's "social contract."

During the lunch hour at Carleton, about 100 demonstrators chanted "Hey, hey, ho, ho, the social contract's got to go." Most of them were support staff. While academic staff are members of CUPE, they weren't represented at the rally.

Otherwise known as Bill 48, the social contract is the province's plan to save $2 billion a year for three years by cutting the wages, benefits and positions of nearly one million public sector workers, including those at universities.

The government has set an Aug. 1 deadline for the university and other public employees to propose their own cuts. If a voluntary agreement hasn't been reached by Aug. 1, the legislation allows the government to unilaterally impose cuts.

Since the social contract was passed on July 7, CUPE members and representatives from the university's administration have met four times to negotiate cost-cutting measures.

The lunch-time demonstrators aimed their discontent at the sixth floor, which houses the office of Carleton President Robin Farquhar and other university administrators.

"Where's Dr. Farquhar now?" asked Anne-Marie Lepine, the vice-president of CUPE Local 3424, which represents support staff on campus, such as office workers and some technical employees.

"I haven't seen him at any of our meetings," said Lepine.

She said union members are upset that Farquhar hasn't taken part in negotiations since he is expected to sign any agreement worked out by the union and administration.

Spruce Riordan, Carleton's vice-president of finance and administration, is the university's negotiating representative and spokesperson on the matter. Riordan was unavailable for comment and did not return The Charlatan's calls. Farquhar is away on holidays and could not be reached either.

Carleton's administration has been told by the provincial government to trim $5.8 million from the university's operating budget this year.

The cuts at Carleton will come mostly from services and concessions by staff such as wage reductions and the elimination of jobs, said Michel Roy, who represents teaching and research assistants as president of CUPE Local 2323.

Carleton can save $1 million, or about 20 per cent of the required cuts, if it reaches an agreement with the province by the deadline.

Roy said the 20 per cent bonus given by the province for negotiating cuts before the deadline is actually a penalty because it's an incentive to hurry an agreement.

Students pick favourite profs

by Charlatan staff

Carleton students have separated the good from the bad and the ugly, choosing five professors and teaching assistants for teaching excellence awards.

This is the first year the awards have been handed out. They were organized by the Student Academic Action Bureau (SAAB), the New University Government (NUG) and the Carleton University Students' Association.

About 40 professors, instructors and teaching assistants were nominated by students last term. Nominees' classes were surveyed and the winners were chosen in March by an awards committee made up of NUG representatives and SAAB staff.

The winners are Barry Ace, a teaching assistant for Canadian studies 12.100, Sam Melkonian, a professor for math 69.119, Pauline Rankin, a professor for Canadian studies 12.302, Marina Sabadnaze, a professor for Russian 36.307, and Jim Sykes, a teaching assistant for engineering 91.241. □

BIKERS GO HOG WILD AT CARLETON

Carleton was swarmed by hogs from across Canada from July 24 during the first ever national convention of the Harley Owners Group (HOG) of Canada. About 600 bikes congregated on campus for field events which tested bikers' abilities.

"It was a very nice location," said Miriam Casey, a local organizer. "People were pleased to be on campus." □

Students uncover prostitution service

by Jeff Warner
The Imprint, University of Waterloo

WATERLOO (CUP) — Students have discovered a small prostitution service operating out of the University of Waterloo's married student apartments.

Calling itself the "Black Orchid Escort Service," the operation offered "oral," "intercourse," and "combined" services to students, in flyers it distributed May 20.

The flyers said clients could call the service to get a bank account number in which to deposit a set amount of money as payment.

The service was "perfectly legal," the flyers claimed, as escorts were not paid directly. They also asked women interested in a "well-paying, flexible job" to call the same phone number.

Staff members at the university newspaper, The Imprint, investigated the service by posing as potential customers and employees and published a story about it May 28. The following week, the local media reported on the discovery of the operation.

Greg Nikolic, a former Waterloo math student, was evicted from the apartments June 9 in connection with the operation, according to a press release from the university's housing authority.

Waterloo Regional Police are "officially investigating" the matter, according to detective Dan Wright.

Section 213 of the Canadian Criminal Code states solicitation for the purpose of prostitution in a public place is illegal. Under section 212, procuring a person for the purposes of prostitution is also illegal.

As part of the paper's investigation, an Imprint staff member had contacted

Black Orchid for one of its "services." Over the phone, an unidentified man said the appointments took place in the same apartment that Nikolic was later evicted from. Three women, "university-aged" and in their "mid-twenties," were supposedly available.

Contacting Black Orchid by phone about "employment," another Imprint staff member was told the job would entail "physical contact." The appointments were to last "no more" than half an hour and Black Orchid had its own apartment to use. The person on the phone identified himself as "Greg."

He said escorts were paid $50 per appointment and were expected to "initiate contact" if the client did not start things.

Charges for Black Orchid's "services" ranged from $95 to $145.

Later, the staff member met the operator from Black Orchid to discuss employment further. Greg claimed he was not really running the operation, but took responsibility for the flyer distribution.

Concerning the nature of employment, Greg said "it's not easy, but it does get easier." Employee safety was partly ensured by condom use.

"Typical clients," he stated, were University of Waterloo and Wilfrid Laurier University students, including some staff members. Greg referred to the lack of sexual experience clients had, claiming most were engineering and math students.

Imprint traced the bank account and phone number and found both were registered under Nikolic's name. A photograph taken of "Greg" meeting the Imprint staff member is clearly identifiable as Nikolic.

Reaction from the authorities to The Imprint story was mild at first. In early June, Sergeant Wayne Shortt of the Campus Police questioned whether or not any criminal activity was taking place, despite student complaints.

"Because prices have been advertised, it doesn't make (Black Orchid) illegal," he said.

At that time Shortt did not know a university residence was involved.

"You probably have more knowledge of that than we do," he told the paper.

But following the local media reports, Al Mackenzie, the university's director of security, said Campus Police was investigating the service and considered it illegal.

However, when Campus Police checked the apartment after the eviction, they found no evidence that prostitution had taken place there. According to Clarke Melville, a solicitor for the university, Nikolic had "jumped ship by that time."

The university has no plans to investigate further and the eviction notice was not appealed.

Melville said Nikolic was evicted because he was not qualified to hold a sublease at the married student apartments. Except for special circumstances, only students can live in the apartments. Nikolic was last registered at the university in May 1992. □

Government's loan "reform" will cost students

by Arn Keeling
Charlatan Staff

Changes to the Canada Student Loan program will take effect Aug. 1, which means both good news and bad news for students.

Bernard Valcourt, federal minister of human resources and labor, announced July 9 that the three-per-cent guarantee fee paid by students who receive loans will be eliminated as of Aug. 1.

What the press release fails to mention, however, is that the interest-free period on loans for six months after leaving school will also be cancelled Aug. 1.

For the past two years, students who received student loans have had to pay a three-per-cent premium up front on the amount of their loan. The government used this money to make up for students who defaulted on repaying their loans and to combat the national debt.

"The fee was implemented to offset the rapidly increasing cost of implementing (loans) programs," said Micheline Racette, Valcourt's press secretary. "The measure was successful."

As well, students had a six-month grace period after finishing full-time schooling during which the government made interest payments on students' loans for them.

The measures were originally proposed in the Tory budget of February 1992, but it was not until Feb. 4 of this year that the Conservatives passed Bill C-76 that made the changes law.

Ron Duhamel, Liberal education critic, said the elimination of the interest-free period would cost students leaving school an extra $35 million dollars per year in interest payments on their loans.

Students will only save $25 million dollars with the three-per-cent tax gone, according to Duhamel. This means students will lose money in the long run under the new measures, he said.

Carl Gillis, chair of the Canadian Federation of Students (CFS), said the organization worked hard for two academic years to secure the elimination of the tax. But he added the cancellation of the interest-free period made the victory bittersweet at best.

"There's a side of me that's cynical," said Gillis, who admitted the move may have been an pre-election ploy as much as it was a CFS lobbying triumph.

Racette said the government's decision to eliminate the tax was not a result of pressure from the CFS, but the change is "part of larger reforms" planned for the loans system. She said she could not comment of the nature of further reforms.

The changes will affect student loans negotiated after Aug. 1, said Linda Fleming, a financial aid administrator at Carleton. Student loans will still be administered in the same fashion, except that the tax will not be removed when the student takes their loan to the bank to receive their money.

Racette said the elimination of the interest-free period will not be a burden to students because they will be finished school and trying to find a job. She said the $6,130 average yearly loan amount is "well within the repayment ability of most borrowers."

But Duhamel said the lack of an interest-free period will devastate students already facing a tough job market and increasing debt loads.

"Now there will be no reprieve," he said.

There still might be in Saskatchewan. According to The Sheaf, the newspaper at the University of Saskatchewan, the province's NDP government has offered to pay interest on all student loans for the six months after leaving school.

Racette disagreed that student loan defaults — which occur nearly twice as often as consumer loan defaults — will increase due to immediate interest payments.

"We don't agree that this will contribute to these problems," she said.

Anti-stalking law draws fire

by Tiffany Moscoe
Excalibur, York University

TORONTO (CUP) — Women have a new law to protect them against unwanted attention from men. But some women's groups have branded it useless and say it could even be used against women.

Bill C-126, which became law in June, includes a provision which makes stalking a criminal offence. Persistent and unwanted following, calling and communication which is "intended to threaten" is now illegal.

"The purpose of the bill is the protection of women," says Hillary McCormick, spokesperson for Justice Minister Pierre Blais.

Women's groups beg to differ.

The law will be useless in the protection of women, warns Susan Bazilli, the legal director of the Metro Toronto Action Committee on Public Violence Against Women and Children.

"The new law could be used against

Gillis said accessibility to student loans will be threatened further by Tory policies such as the privatization of their administration.

A government report, made public earlier this year, suggested turning over more of the administration to one or two private banks.

Gillis said under the government plan, private banks could turn away students who are considered a bad credit risk. Under the current program, a student merely has to establish financial need to qualify for a loan. □ women who are attempting to collect support payments from ex-spouses," says Bazilli. This has happened with similar laws in the U.S., she says.

Women's groups asked that the law contain a "gender preamble" stating that the primary purpose of the legislation is to protect women. The request was denied.

"All our suggestions were ignored. Women were lied to and given the run-around by the federal government," Bazilli says.

McCormick says stalking affects men as well as women, and that, with the proposed preamble, the bill could be challenged under the gender equality provision in the Charter of Rights.

But some women's groups worry about the way the law will be interpreted by male judges.

Because the law requires victims to "reasonably" fear for their safety, they

LOLLAPALOOZA III

by TIM PRYOR

RAGE AGAINST THE MACHINE

This being my first trip to Lollapalooza, I was excited yet sceptical at the prospect of checking out this corporate-sponsored event.

A huge beer company should not be promoting any concert that promotes itself as an "alternative" to the mainstream. Just what is Molson an alternative to? Labatt's?

Cigarettes were being peddled for $7 a pack, t-shirts were an exorbitant $28, tickets were $40 and Molson hot-air balloons flew overhead.

The bands were less commercial than in the past years. There was no Jane's Addiction, no Red Hot Chili Peppers and no Pearl Jam. At the same time, there were no independent bands on stage. There are countless cool indie bands such as Pavement or Velocity Girl that could use the exposure that the major label bands already enjoy.

Moreover, this year's festival was also plagued by the same tokenism that was evident in previous years. There was only one all-female group on the main stage, Babes in Toyland. Like previous years with Ice T and Ice Cube, the token rap group Arrested Development got stuck early on in the bill, even though they've sold more albums than most, if not all, of the other groups at Lollapalooza.

The crowd was a potpourri of freaks, jocks, skaters, music lovers, beer drinkers, and pot smokers. However, a large majority of the crowd was intent on ruining the show for those who wanted to enjoy the bands.

These lunkheads, in an effort to "out-mosh" each other, would crowd surf and slam to just about anything. As a result, I saw one poor sap on a stretcher for upwards of two hours.

Perhaps the most pitiful example of slamming was the group of idiots who were crowd surfing to the Jerky Boys' prank phone call album which was playing in between sets. Or the meatheads who were violently slamming during the mellow sounds of D.C. pop band Unrest.

While moshing is so cool, so alternative, such a big "fuck you" to authority, the huge inflatable beer can next to the pit kept things in perspective.

But not everyone there was out to make a dollar. People For The Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA) were there to inform people about cruelty to animals. Their tasty pictures of mutilated animals did the trick.

Also present were the hemp-legalization movement, an AIDS rights organization from Toronto, an anti-censorship group and a group called Life Beat, which helps people living with AIDS. These groups were there passing out pamphlets and information about their respective causes.

This year's event was fun, but there could certainly be improvements: less corporate involvement, a better mix of bands — give us gods like Mercury Rev and Sebadoh, who are on some of the other stops.

Scheduling also left something to be desired. I was forced to miss much of Tool to catch Arrested Development and most of Babes In Toyland to see Unrest. Perhaps fewer bands would have been a better idea (first suggestion: get rid of Alice in Chains). More advocacy groups would also be cool.

As Lollapalooza gets more popular, hopefully there will be more underground bands and less commercial endorsements, as people come for the event, not the big names. □

THE MAIN STAGE

Lollapalooza has become the commercial icon for the "alternative" music scene. This year's rolled through Molson Park in Barrie, Ont. with more bands and more things to see and do than in years past.

Kicking off the festivities on the main stage was Rage Against the Machine, who was playing for keeps. Starting off with their hit "Killing in the Name," vocalist Zach La Rocha looked like a man possessed.

Beneath him, the largest mosh pit I have ever seen began its day-long stomp. Hoses sprayed water on the crowds as the temperature reached upwards of 30 degrees.

After Rage left the stage, comic relief was provided by a DJ from Toronto's commercial alternative station, CFNY. Like Jesus to his disciples, he declared "Watch out for the person next to you! If they go down, help them up, and they will help you up! Let's make this pit, THE PIT of pits!" Amen!

Arrested Development was a big surprise. Their pleasant rap had the crowd jumping up and down, giving people who didn't want to knock each other's heads off a chance to get within good viewing distance of the stage.

The day, however, belonged to Fishbone, the veteran rock-ska combo. Starting their set by telling the crowd they should dance to the music instead of mindlessly pummelling each other (what a novel concept), Fishbone established total control over the audience.

When vocalist Angelo Moore moved his finger 'round and 'round, the crowd followed to form a human whirlpool. Moore then dove into the crowd, making his way to the back of the pit, while singing their new single "Swim."

By the time Dinosaur Jr. took the stage, the pit area had been turned into one great mudbath. Pit thugs were wet, sweaty and caked in slop. Dinosaur Jr. played some of their best material including "Freak Scene," "Start Choppin'" and "Thumb."

Just as things were getting exciting, Alice in Chains hit the stage and delivered the worst performance of the day. Lead singer Layne Staley is one of those geeks who enjoys bragging about how many drugs the band does. "Hey I'm trippin' in Toronto!" he said between songs.

Listen, pal, we don't care how much heroine you inject into your body or how much acid you drop. Your Bon Jovi metal disguised as "grunge" is shit, and why don't you get a life?

ROYAL TRUX

ALICE IN CHAINS

Relief came in the form of Primus.

They kicked off their last set with their new single "My Name Is Mud," and then played selections off all three of their studio albums.

Claypool, the lead singer, was just as whacked live as he sounds on album. That crazed voice, those foot movements, and of course, his spectacular bass-playing, kept the crowd's attention. It is truly phenomenal how a band with such a unique sound could be headlining a major concert like this one.

Just as the crowd was getting psyched up by Primus, Alice in Chains' guitarist Jerry Cantrell came on stage to play with Claypool and drummer Tim Alexander. Cantrell started into his guitar-solo cheesedom, ruining the vibe Primus had created.

Luckily, Cantrell soon left the stage and Primus broke into a cover of Ministry's "Thieves," which sent the crowd into its biggest frenzy of the day.

THE SECOND STAGE

Over at the second stage, surprise addition Royal Trux served up some good raunch 'n' roll and proved much more listenable live than on record.

Unrest was up next, and played a lot of material off their new album, but unfortunately didn't play much off of last year's classic Imperial f.f.r.r. record.

Tool followed, serving up plenty of sludge off their new platter, Undertow. They were very heavy, and drew the largest crowd of the day at the second stage.

The pit goons probably didn't enjoy the mellower sounds of Arrested Development, so Tool provided a great escape. However, lead singer Maynard James Keenan threatened to dethrone Michael Bolton for worst hair on a rock star. His head was shaved very high on his scalp, which was split in two by a long strip of hair from front to back. Call it the Camaro-punk hairdo.

Before each band came on stage, a chainsaw juggler "entertained" the audience. He proved an able juggler, but rehashed the same racist, sexist, homophobic jokes each time he took the stage.

He ridiculed Asians by referring to UCLA as the "University of Caucasians Lost Among Asians" and made sexist remarks such as "Can I trim your bush?" while addressing two women in the crowd. □

Student jobless rate remains high

by Arn Keeling

OTTAWA (CUP) — Students in Ottawa and around Ontario are facing high unemployment again this summer, as enrolment in summer courses at some universities is increasing.

"Ontario's youth unemployment rate is 17 per cent, almost double the provincial unemployment rate," says Liberal MPP Dalton McGuinty, the province's education and training critic.

As well, according to Statistics Canada numbers compiled by the Canadian Federation of Students, the unemployment rate for students in Ontario this June was 20 per cent.

Although this represents a small decrease from last summer's average of 20.3 per cent, two summers ago the student unemployment rate averaged 14.5 per cent.

The number of jobs available and the number of students placed in jobs by the Canada Employment Centre for Students has fallen, says Bob Gould, manager of the centre in Ottawa.

"Since last summer there is a decrease," he says.

Gould says he expects about 8,500 job vacancies will be filled through the centre this summer, compared to 9,349 last year.

"I hope because people aren't using the service, that means they're working," Gould says.

While summer unemployment continues to plague students, some Ontario universities are seeing summer enrolment rise.

For the past three years, Carleton has seen an increase in summer enrolment. And although the final figures are not in for this summer, early indications are another jump in summer schooling.

According to first-term figures from Carleton's office of budget planning, total undergraduate summer enrolment has risen 1.1 per cent from last year, by 148 students. Between 1990 and 1992, total summer enrolment has jumped about five per cent, or 281 students.

In Toronto, enrolment in York University summer session courses has significantly risen this year. Enrolment in summer school is up at Toronto's other two universities as well.

"What we've noticed is when the economy is tight there are more enrolments," says Skip Bassford, dean of Atkinson College, which runs York's summer courses.

One student who has yet to find a job this summer is John Kirkham, a third-year biology student at Carleton.

He says he is relying on occasional work tutoring and volunteer work to fill his time in the summer. Kirkham says this is the worst summer he has seen for job availability.

"There are noticeably fewer postings at the employment centre," he says.

When he has applied for jobs, the news has always been bad.

"Generally, I apply and I don't hear back," he says.

Kirkham says he isn't able to take summer courses because his student loans are not enough to cover the cost of summer tuition as well as his fall-winter term expenses.

Some York students are taking summer courses to make up for time lost due to part-time work during the school year and because of the lack of summer employment.

"My job ran out just before Christmas, so I took more courses (during the summer)," says Gabriella Costa, a third-year sociology major.

Karen Lee, a fourth-year history and African studies major also taking courses to finish her degree on time, says there is nothing available in terms of employment.

Students are getting some help from the employment centre, which offers resume-writing and job-hunting advice.

As well, Gould says efforts are being made to make students more attractive to potential employers, including telemarketing and radio and newspaper advertisements.

"We do market students," he says.

But Gould has no illusions about the job situation for students: "It's going to get harder."

"The law makes women susceptible to being branded hysterical, as we commonly see in rape cases," she says.

McCormick describes this interpretation as outdated.

"Reasonable' is now taken into consideration with respect to the history of discrimination that women have endured," she said.

McCormick says the legislation will make it much easier for victims to prosecute, since the threshold for unlawful behaviour has been lowered to include a much broader range of conduct.

The actual effectiveness of the law has yet to be determined as stalking charges filter through the court system.

Tory loan reform plan just smoke and mirrors

Since the election of the so-called "Progressive" Conservatives in 1984, funding for students who can't afford the spiralling cost of attending universities and colleges has been under siege.

According to opposition critics and the Canadian Federation of Students, the federal government hasn't changed the cost-of-living criteria used to evaluate students' financial need since 1985.

As well, cuts to transfer payments to the provinces are partly to blame for the elimination of grants in Ontario and declining funding for universities across the country.

Now, the feds are hitting the Canada Student Loan program. The move to eliminate the three-percent tax on student loans Aug. 1 has been used as a smoke screen to hide the loss of the six-month interest-free loan period students have after leaving school.

Not only will this reform cost students as a whole more than before, it will affect individual students in a much more damaging way in the long run.

A student who is entering the job market will be faced with interest compiling on their loan principal immediately, so loans will take longer to pay back. More students may also be forced to default on their loans after they leave school, precisely the problem the government wants to avoid.

While the students will now be hit as they leave school, there is a jobs crisis in this country. This week's Maclean's magazine cover proclaims the jobless rate is over 1.5 million. This is not an environment in which to release graduates worried about how they will make their loan payment each month.

The feds have little sympathy for students. A spokesperson for Bernard Valcourt, minister of human resources and labor, said the $6,130 average yearly loan amount is "well within the repayment ability of most borrowers."

What the government seems to be saying is, "Load on the debt! Students will all get cushy jobs when they graduate from university anyway."

Sure.

The fact is that tuition costs, living costs, book costs and diminishing job prospects in many fields are conspiring to force students into longer schooling and higher debts. There are no guarantees students will emerge from university with a job awaiting them.

What is even scarier is that the government has even more "reforms" in store for the loans system. Although the government has yet to announce many of the proposed changes, one plan would give more of the student loan administration to a single, private bank.

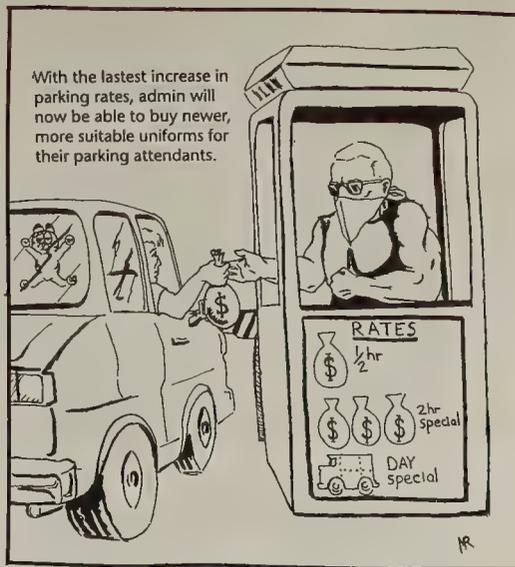

This corporation would have the power to turn away students considered a bad credit risk. Right now, a student only has to establish financial need to qualify for a loan.

In other words, many of the students who need the money most may be left out in the cold. A person whose business venture failed might be rejected if they decide to return to school. A single parent with dependent children might just be another bad credit risk to a bank.

The CFS, far from being cynical about the recent and proposed changes, has signs plastered all over Carleton proclaiming a victory in its fight to help students. How can the CFS take any pride in a "victory" that will bleed students of still more money and possibly limit accessibility further?

Privatization, lies and deception. Welcome to Canada Student Loans under the Tories. AK

OPINION

Through the eyes of a stranger

A visiting Korean woman reflects on how she perceives and is perceived by Canadian society.

by Yonnie Kim

Yonnie is a student from South Korea in Carleton's ESL program for the summer.

I am a stranger here. I am a student at the Seoul National University studying for five months in Ottawa. I am in a strange land. I thought people in Canada would not expect me to speak English very well and they would treat me like a guest.

In Korea, we can easily spot a foreigner. If we encounter a white or black person in the street, we do not expect them to speak Korean.

My mind is strongly programmed to think that people with different appearances are strangers.

As a stranger in Korea, you would be treated very generously. We would think you might feel uncomfortable in a strange country, so we would pay you more attention to give you a good impression of Korea.

But what I found here is a more or less unfriendly response for my stammering English. People seem a little annoyed when I take time to count the Canadian coins still unfamiliar to me. It seems the idea that I might be a foreigner would never cross their minds. Someone even tried to ask me for directions. In

It seems the idea that I might be a foreigner would never cross their minds.

Korea, you would be insane to try that — asking directions from a foreigner.

But in Canada, people who want to know the way from me are not crazy. They just do not notice that I am a stranger here.

Some of my classmates complain that Canadians are so cold that it is difficult to make friends here. But I think it is more suitable to say that Canadians are generally indifferent to others.

They seldom seem interested in the social issues of their country. Although they say politics is a hot topic in Canada, I find it is not so often discussed as sex or the weather.

Compared with the situation of a university student

Compared with the situation of a university student in Korea, Canada is very relaxed.

in Korea, Canada is very relaxed. In Korea, we are always discussing matters which are not related to us as individuals but to the whole of Korea. Every morning, we have enthusiastic conversations about the headlines of several daily newspapers which have very different ideas about political issues.

We usually speak out by posting opinion posters everywhere on campus. In this way, we can figure out other students' ideas effectively and sometimes we have heated conflicts. If a remarkable opinion is put up, often many posters emerge with supporting and retorting opinions the very next day.

I am not saying that Canadians never pay attention to social matters.

But often for me it is difficult to find clues that show me you are thinking more about the condition of your society than who is going to win the Stanley Cup this season. □

Athletics names new coach to ski team

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

The best just got better.

Not content with just having one of the top nordic ski programs in the country, Carleton's athletic department has hired a former national ski team member to maintain the university's reputation as a nordic ski powerhouse.

Besides skiing nationally, newcomer Mark Rabb coached the men's nordic ski team at Queen's to a third-place finish in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association championships two years ago.

He joins a Carleton program that has been a consistent winner during the past decade.

Last year the Ravens extended their streak of finishing in the top three for six straight years. The women's team won gold for a second consecutive year while the men claimed silver.

Despite that success, the Carleton program was still missing stability. Until this year, the nordic ski program was funded by the university, but coached and administered by two student coaches. Every new year brought with it new students, new demands, new coaches. A permanent coach should eliminate those problems.

"He'll be good for the team for the sake of continuity," says team member Frank Ferrari. "Having a different student coach every year made for a lot of ups and downs with different ideas and personalities being brought forth."

An outside coach should also remove the workload previously placed on student coaches, says women's varsity coordinator Gail Blake.

"We were asking a lot of the student coaches," she says. "They were coaching the team, participating as skiers and going to school. It's a lot to ask. They were not only looking after themselves but the entire team."

Blake says Rabb will help a lot.

"He'll take charge of travel arrangements, making sure we have team members at races, making sure we get enough races to qualify for the provincial championships, coach, and manage a team of about 30 students."

Besides stability, Rabb should also provide a new focus.

"Last year things started to stagnate a little," says Ferrari. "He's a teacher who's really interested in coaching and athletes and he should be able to add a little objectivity and new blood into the program."

Carleton becomes the third Ontario university to employ a coach for its nordic ski team.

The University of Western Ontario and Laurentian University both have a faculty coach for their programs.

Rabb is on vacation in Europe and was unavailable for comment. □

Support staff adds CFL experience to Ravens

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

Raven football coach Donn Smith announced his coaching staff for the upcoming season July 22.

Former head coach Gary Shaver remains with the team as the defensive coordinator. Shaver will also be responsible for the defensive secondary and coaching the linebackers against the pass.

Newcomer Randy Fournier joins Shaver on defence, taking charge of the defensive line as well as coaching the linebackers against the run.

Before coming to the Ravens, Fournier played with the Ottawa Rough Riders from 1981-85 as a defensive linesman. He coached both linebackers and the defensive line with the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees between 1987-89 and then moved on to the same duties with Ottawa Sooners last year.

"He's a teacher, a leader and a motivator," says Smith. "It's as simple as that. He really knows how to get guys fired up for a game."

The second newcomer to Smith's team is former Canadian Football League Richard Holmes, who will coach the running backs. Holmes played with the Riders, Hamilton and Winnipeg from 1977-79, rushing for over 1,000 yards with Ottawa in his rookie year. As a running back coach, Holmes has had stints with Ottawa's Gee-Gees, Sooners and Bootleggers.

"He always impressed me as a player, as a knowledgeable individual of the game," says Smith. "He was an excellent running back and I'm sure he'll impart his knowledge to the players."

The only returnee from last year's volunteer staff is Dave Waterhouse, former all-star of the Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference. Waterhouse will coach the receivers on offence.

Steve Howlett is Smith's final addition to the coaching staff. The former CFL wide receiver with Edmonton from 1985-87 and the Rough Riders from 1987-89 will coach the Raven quarterbacks. Smith plucked Howlett from the Ottawa Sooners, where he coached the receivers on last year's national junior champions.

"He's exactly what I need," says Smith. "He has a great understanding of quarterback technique and has a great ability to read defence patterns."

The new coaches could not be reached for comment.

Smith himself will control the offensive line and coordinate the offence. The athletics department hired Smith, a former CFL all-star with two Grey Cup rings, earlier this year. □

Canucks row to World University Games success

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

Bring on the Olympics.

Canadian university athletes produced 40 medal-winning performances — 12 gold, 14 silver, 14 bronze — during this year's World University Games in Buffalo, N.Y.

The 40 medals topped Canada's previous best of 38 in Edmonton in 1983. Only the United States won more, with 75 medals.

Rowing domination on the final day of competition pushed Canada to the 40-medal plateau, when Canadians earned 13 medals in 15 rowing finals. Five gold medals, five silver and three bronze were Canada's take from the event held at the Henley regatta course in St. Catharines, Ont.

Marnie McBean, a double Olympic gold medalist and University of Western Ontario student, was a double winner again, capturing a silver in heavyweight single sculls. She also joined schoolmate Michelle Darville, Kelly Mahon of B.C.'s Soanichton College, and Dianne O'Grady of Queen's University, for gold in the quadruple sculls.

Mahon was the lone Canadian to win two gold medals after adding the women's eights title.

Lightweight pair Rachel Starr of McGill University and Tracy Duncan from the University of Saskatchewan also won gold, as did University of Victoria student Wendy Wiebe in lightweight singles.

In men's pairs, Darren Barber and Phil Graham, both Victoria students, also captured gold.

Head rowing coach Brian Richardson will now conduct a two-week camp in London, Ont. to select his team for the world championships in the Czech Republic next month. He called it a "starting foundation" for the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta, Ga.

"This has been an excellent experience for the younger members of the team," he said.

His enthusiasm was shared by the Canadian chef de mission Harry Zarins of Concordia University in Montreal.

"Look what happened: our athletes won 15 medals in one day, which has to rate as one of the greatest days in Canadian sport," he said. "These games have been a launching pad for some interesting things that might happen for us at the Olympics in Atlanta in 1996."

While Canadian athletes concluded the games in high spirits, organizers of the event were left with a financial headache. Disappointing ticket sales, lack of sponsorship and no television revenue for the event make a deficit almost certain.

Media relations manager Irene Liguori said any deficit would probably be less than $1 million U.S.

Games' executive director Kathy Scanlan scoffed at suggestions the deficit might go higher.

"If it were $5 million, we'd have stopped feeding the athletes two days before the games ended," Scanlan told the Ottawa Citizen. "We would have been flat broke."

Scanlan had hoped to raise $6 million by selling 500,000 tickets for the 11-day event but she concedes they did fall short of that goal. About 300,000 tickets were sold for the games.

Sheffield, England, lost about $20 million as host to the 1991 Games and had to make drastic cuts to public services to cover their deficit.

To avoid that fiasco, Liguori said Buffalo organizers cut their budget by about 40 per cent before the Games, scaled back pageantry and relied on volunteers to handle a larger work load. □

Celebrating Canadian music

CFNY Edgefest: Day 1
Ontario Place Pavillion, Toronto
CANADA DAY

Despite competing with so many concerts, festivals and multi-act gigs taking place this summer, Toronto's first ever Edgefest managed to be very popular with concert-goers.

The goal of this two-day festival, sponsored by Toronto radio station CFNY, was to exhibit an eclectic sampling of music. Day 1 — Canada Day — showcased Canadian musical talent. Day 2 was an international affair, featuring Ned's Atomic Dustbin, Judy Bats, Radiohead and Ottawa's own Furnaceface.

The wide diversity of bands on Day 1 meant everyone had a chance to be exposed to groups they would otherwise never hear. Plus, it served as a good contrast to the Canada Day celebration at Barrie's Molson Park, which featured mainly American bands like Van Halen.

The sold-out show attracted 7,500 music lovers to Ontario Place's revolving stage. The weather cooperated with an enthusiastic crowd and a stellar line-up for a day of sonic stimulation.

For some reason, opening band hHead kicked off the day 20 minutes early at 12:30 p.m., as people were still arriving. Regardless, they were a great way to start off the day. Their unconventional alternative-rock tunes blasted through the park as they expended their energy jumping about the stage.

Their set consisted of songs from their debut independent CD release, Fireman. Thanks to heavy rotation on CFNY, their single "Collide" had the crowd dancing and singing along. They ended their 30-minute set with "Happy," their entry into this year's CFNY New Music Search contest. From their set, it was clear why these guys have a devoted following throughout Canada's independent music community.

Shadowy Men on a Shadowy Planet triumphed on musical ability alone. Literally lyricless, the trio moved through an entrancing set that had the crowd caught up in their sound.

When they started playing the instantly recognizable "Having an Average Weekend" (a.k.a. the theme from

Lowest of the Low's Stephen Stanley: "I've fallen and I... oh, forget it."

The Kids in the Hall, the crowd flipped out. It wasn't quite clear if they were cheering the song or the TV show.

Up next were the Odds, whose quirky sense of humor (as witnessed by their stint with The Kids in the Hall for their "Heterosexual Man" video) is matched only by their overwhelming love for their music.

Odds' guitarist-vocalist Steven Drake, when asked what he'd do if he wasn't playing music, replied, "I always ask myself that question... nuclear physics or biology."

He's serious, although in the end he admitted "there's nothing else" he'd rather be doing.

The Odds managed to stir up what

It was the perfect ending for a successful and entertaining Canada Day that left few people able to resist the spirit of Canadian patriotism. □

Man" and Kid in the Hall Bruce McColluch, hanging around backstage sporting sunglasses and looking quite out of it, wondering if the Odds had played yet?

Just curious.

Of the many bands on the bill, Change of Heart dare not be left unmentioned. This Toronto-based band has been around for a long time, and it showed. Their musical maturity enthralled the crowd and their thrashy but polished guitars were overwhelming.

Joining in the fun, several people leapt over security and rushed the stage. The result was a somewhat tame mosh pit and a weary-looking band. Nevertheless, the band members regained their composure, even while fans ran onto the ground-level stage and sang into the mikes.

And there was still more to come. The musical collective that is Me, Mom and Morgentaler was simply amazing. Their energetic performance caused the audience to rush the stage again, with moshing all around. At this point, security started to tighten up. As before, trying to get on-stage was a thrill few in the pit could resist.

The resulting mayhem caused security to cut Me, Mom and Morgentaler's set short to only six songs. It didn't matter, though, because with their magical charisma they gave everyone their money's worth with their first three songs.

Recently signed to music label giant Warner, folk-pop quartet The Waltons received a warm welcome, which set the tone for their entire set. The music of this Saskatchewan-bred, Toronto-based band had the crowd dancing, caught up in Jason Plumb's soothing and enchanting vocals. They created a familiar yet original sound characterized by an infectious, steady grace.

Even with the endless supply of free beer and refreshments backstage, it must have been quite the long wait if you were one of the headliners. It didn't show on had become a somewhat quiet crowd with their melodic post-punk pop. In doing so, they took themselves and the audience to greater heights of satisfaction, all through the simple pleasure of doing what they love best.

By the way, was that "Heterosexual

Lowest of the Low, who took to the stage at 10:30 p.m. looking refreshed.

They then pumped out an incredible sounding pure rock set. The experience proved to be an overwhelming one for singer-guitarist Stephen Stanley. Cheered on by the crowd, he swung his guitar at the floor repeatedly until it was destroyed.

As the event came to a close, the Rheostatics were preparing backstage for their headlining show. Their music has been described as glorious noise influenced by the enormous scale of the Canadian landscape. The band itself has been called an undiscovered national treasure.

After seeing the Rheostatics in concert, it's easy to see why they impress fans across North America with their love of the sounds they make. Their set was an endless hour of extraordinary Canadian guitar masterpieces.

It was the perfect ending for a successful and entertaining Canada Day that left few people able to resist the spirit of Canadian patriotism. □

The sounds of summer come to Ottawa

by Chris Reid
Charlatan Staff

For 10 days each summer, Ottawa is transformed into an oasis of jazz. From July 16-25, you could hear the sounds of jazz everywhere: walking through Rideau Centre, enjoying a beer at the Royal Oak or hanging out at the National Gallery.

Jacques Emond, the festival's programming manager, notes that over half the artists featured in this year's lineup are local musicians. This, notes Emond, is beneficial to local jazz musicians.

"I think it gives them a chance to be known outside of a club environment," says Emond.

"Some of these musicians, they only perform with their own group but not with other groups, so it's a platform for them to put their music in front of a large

The Angstones, showing off the latest in stylish headwear.

"I think basically the festival musicians appreciate that they get a chance to be heard," he says.

The festival itself had something for everybody, from the seasoned jazz veteran to the people who still aren't sure when exactly to clap their hands.

The P.J. Perry Quintet, a Canadian act, kicked off the festival July 16 at Confederation Park. On a stage replete with ferns (surely the symbolic plant of jazz), they won the audience over with their brand of energetic bop.

Described as a jazz veteran, saxophonist Perry has played with Dizzy Gillespie and was a 1993 Juno award-winner. Perry's opinion of jazz festivals is basically a positive one.

"Jazz music and festivals have something in common, and that is that every once in a while you can hit upon an evening when everything could be working perfectly, so it doesn't matter what festival you're at, or for that matter what band you're listening to," he says. "Great jazz music sort of appears for no rhyme or reason and you can be witness to a great evening of jazz in the most inauspicious of places."

One of those places would be at the late night jam sessions, held at the Penguin on the two Saturdays of the 10-day festival, and at the Westin Hotel the rest of the festival.

with his trio, bassist Alec Walkington and pianist Andre White. They played for a few songs, but after that, all bets were off as to who you'd see sitting in for a set. Musicians ranged from local students to festival headliners like Chico Hamilton and Montreal's La Bande à Magoo.

"There (are) people in here now at their fourth straight night at the jam session who I met in a bar before the first jam session," says Magadini. "The girl liked jazz and her boyfriend said, 'I don't care for jazz very much,' and I said, 'You're wrong. You just don't know what kind of jazz you like. Everybody's gonna find some kind of jazz they like cause jazz is just a small word — four letters — that goes over a vast array of music.'

"You know, there's such a wide variety and I know anybody who likes music will like jazz. It's just a matter of what do you like."

For people into avant-garde jazz, the With an Edge concert series fit the bill. Sponsored by CKCU and held in the National Arts Centre Studio on alternating nights, it featured musicians that don't conform to traditional jazz conventions.

One show this year featured musicians Joe McPhee and David Prentice. Their largely improvised session was played in the intimate NAC studio where they coaxed eerie, bizarre and even hypnotic sounds out of an array of horns and violins. Their performance ignored all established musical forms and pushed the limits of the instruments they played.

Another musical stand-out at this year's festival was Ottawa's The Angstones, who brought their unique polka jazz-fusion sound to the World Exchange Plaza. Under a sunny sky they won the audience over with their versions of "So Long, Farewell" and Boney M's cheese-classic "Rasputin."

But the best thing about these fellows was, since their songs were less solo-oriented than most jazz, knowing when to clap wasn't a problem.

In short, this festival had it all. With the mostly excellent weather and quality jazz acts (like the all-female quintet, Velvet Glove), it was the perfect setting for jazz novices and experts alike to see jazz audience."

Emond noted that local content was an important and growing part of the festival.

CUSA locked in labor dispute

by Brent Dowdall
Charlatan staff

Two employees of the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) have been reinstated in their positions after being fired in July.

The reinstatements are part of a dispute between CUSA and some of its service co-ordinators which culminated in a hearing at the Ontario Labor Relations Board in Toronto Aug. 23-31.

This summer, some of CUSA's service co-ordinators tried to organize a union. Wayne Ross, co-ordinator of the Student Academic Action Bureau, and Renée Twaddle, co-ordinator of the Carleton Women's Centre, contend they were fired because they were trying to unionize CUSA employees.

"I say it was union-busting," says Ross. "CUSA has said they fired us for cause, but when we challenged them in the hearings, they didn't argue against us on our claim that we were fired because we were union organizers."

The board hearings were to determine whether CUSA used unfair labor practices in firing Ross and Twaddle. But if it decides CUSA fired them for organizing a union, the board could automatically certify about 250 CUSA employees as a single bargaining unit.

The Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) Local 1281 filed complaints with the board Aug. 5 over the firings of Ross and Twaddle. CUSA fired Ross July 15 and Twaddle July 29, stating no reason except "just cause."

Local 1281 obtained an order from the board Aug. 9 which allowed Ross and Twaddle to return temporarily to their jobs until the board reaches a ruling, which is expected to come within the next two weeks.

The complaints are being filed under Section 91 and Section 9.2 of the Ontario Labor Relations Act. Section 91 deals with unfair labor practices. Section 9.2 allows the board to automatically certify employees in a workplace if it rules that the employer interfered with employees trying to unionize, says Brian Robinson, chief steward of Local 1281.

A pre-hearing negotiation was held Aug. 18, but no settlement was reached.

CUSA presented no evidence at the hearing, although CUSA President Lucy Watson says the association "actively contested and didn't concede" the complaints filed under the sections.

"It's just not worth it, to go on the stand and criticize another person, to encourage the bad feeling between certain members of the executive and certain service co-ordinators," says Watson.

She says CUSA did have "damaging" evidence but refuses to elaborate.

Watson says she would rather CUSA employees vote on whether to unionize, rather than be automatically certified.

"Either way, if there's certification that's fine, if there's no certification that's fine too, but I would prefer that the people involved make that decision for themselves.

"I am actually in favor of unions, although nobody ever directed that question to me before."

The board has never ruled under Section 9.2 of the Ontario Labor Relations Act, which came into effect on Jan. 1.

Twaddle says unionizing would protect co-ordinators whose opinions may differ from that of the CUSA executive. Ross says he wants more specific terms of reference for co-ordinators' jobs, as well as a collective agreement to govern work relations between all employees and CUSA.

Watson's "ballpark figure" for CUSA's total costs incurred as a result of the case is $2,500. Ross says CUPE paid all expenses for Ross and Twaddle, which were about $15,000.

Twaddle says six service co-ordinators began talking about organizing a union in early May. She says they intended to start organizing with co-ordinators and then move to other employees such as CUSA's clerks and bar staff.

She says the core group met with the co-ordinators of the Carleton Disability Awareness Centre, Janet Burrows and Sheryl Ananny, in late May.

But, in a letter dated June 2 addressed to all service co-ordinators, Burrows and Ananny wrote they were unable to support the union.

Burrows says she and Ananny wrote the letter to "let everyone know where we stood."

"We chose not to get involved at present because we felt the politics of some of the other service co-ordinators were personal, because not all service co-ordinators were invited or included in union meetings," says Burrows.

She also says union-organizing meetings were held during co-ordinator's office hours and the union drive took time away from operating services.

Watson says she brought up the union at a service meeting June 9 in order to get it out in the open.

"If we had been approached directly about our feelings about unions, it would have been a very honest and very open conversation and that's what I was attempting to achieve at the June 9 meeting."

Ross says two days before he was fired on July 13, he asked Gary Anandasangaree, CUSA's director of academics, if Anandasangaree had any problems with his work to that point.

Ross says Anandasangaree, who is his supervisor, said 'no.' Two days later, Ross says he met Anandasangaree and Watson in her office and she handed him a letter which said he was "terminated for cause."

Watson refused to discuss the reasons for firing Ross or Twaddle. CUSA Director of Services Theresa Cowan and Anandasangaree refused to comment. □

Chronology of union events

May 3, 1993 — Service co-ordinators and CUSA executive begin their new jobs. Around this time, some service co-ordinators start talking about unionizing. They talk to the Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 1281.

June 2 — Service co-ordinators Janet Burrows and Sheryl Ananny write a letter to other co-ordinators saying they cannot support the union. Some service co-ordinators say they believe this is the date CUSA found out for sure about the union discussions.

June 9 — All service co-ordinators meet with Watson, Cowan and Anandasangaree. Watson asks about the union.

July 8 — Co-ordinator Renée Twaddle meets with Watson and Cowan. She is told she will be fired on July 29 if her job performance doesn't improve.

July 15 — Ross is fired.

July 29 — Fouad Kanaan, volunteer bureau co-ordinator, submits his resignation. Twaddle is fired.

Aug. 5 — Local 1281 files complaints with the Ontario Labor Relations Board.

Local 1281 asks for an interim order to reinstate Ross and Twaddle. The local also files a complaint of unfair labor practices and an application for certification of a bargaining unit. CUSA President Lucy Watson says this is the date she got formal confirmation of the union drive.

Aug. 11 — Ross and Twaddle return to work after an interim order is issued by the board.

Aug. 18 — With the hearing set for Aug. 19, pre-hearing negotiations are held between Local 1281 and CUSA. After seven hours of negotiations, Watson takes a proposed settlement back to the CUSA executive. She has refused to comment on the settlement.

Aug. 19 — The executive refuses to accept the proposal.

Aug. 23 — Hearings begin in Toronto. CUSA presents no evidence. Ross testifies Aug. 23 and 24, Twaddle on Aug. 24, 25 and 26.

Aug. 31 — Closing arguments are heard by the board. □

CUSA director of services under scrutiny

by Karin Jordan
Charlatan staff

An executive member of the undergraduate students' association has been accused of embellishing the truth about her experience to get her job.

But Theresa Cowan says she didn't misrepresent her experience at the Carleton Women's Centre on campus when she applied for the position of director of services.

Cowan was hired by the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) in May.

At a CUSA council meeting Aug. 11, former CUSA service co-ordinator All Biggs read out a letter from Lisa Jacobs, last year's co-ordinator of the women's centre.

Jacobs wrote she agreed to let Cowan use her as a reference when applying for the job of vice-president internal, not director of services. Jacobs's letter noted that although Cowan completed a one-day volunteer training session in January, she never fulfilled her duties as a volunteer.

The letter says Cowan "inappropriately used the Carleton Women's Centre as a reference for her experience in working with a CUSA service, to obtain her current position as director of services."

Cowan says she spent some time at the centre, but then she got involved in the CUSA elections and didn't have time to volunteer for shifts.

"I was not an actual volunteer but I did go to a couple of collective meetings," she says.

In her position paper for director of services, Cowan wrote, "My experience at the Women's Centre has provided me with an appreciation for the collective process and has taught me the priceless worth of other people's input. Through this and other experiences, I have developed an ability to form insightful, educated and collective decisions."

Jacobs's letter, dated June 30, is addressed to CUSA President Lucy Watson and notes copies going to CUSA vice-president internal Rob Jamieson, CUSA finance commissioner René Faucher and women's centre co-ordinator Renée Twaddle.

However, Watson says no one at CUSA got a copy of the letter. She says the first time she heard of the letter was at the council meeting.

Cowan says she was surprised to learn of Jacobs's letter at the meeting. "Throughout the hiring board and throughout my first couple of weeks when Lisa was here she was very supportive. So this came as a big surprise to me." Cowan says she specifically discussed applying for director of services with Jacobs.

Jacobs could not be reached for comment.

Biggs, last year's co-ordinator of the Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Centre, says she made Jacobs's letter public because of her concern over what she sees as a poor relationship between Cowan and the women's centre.

"Perhaps if Theresa had turned out to be a wonderful director of services, maybe no one would've said anything. But because the services are in such rough shape, you start to ask, 'Hey, how did she get hired in the first place?'"

Biggs, who has been a member of the women's centre collective for four years, says she is upset Cowan shut the centre down for a day in early August after CUSA fired its co-ordinator July 29.

Biggs says collective members may use the centre as a refuge when they feel unsafe.

"Shutting it down shows complete disregard for the volunteers of the centre. If (Cowan) had been involved in the centre, she'd have understood it's not just a place where you go and eat your lunch."

Cowan says she changed the locks at the centre because she heard some collective members were planning to sabotage the centre.

"I was concerned for the safety of the property in there. There's probably $100,000 worth of resources — there's a computer in there, there's a lot of stuff. And I was concerned that people might come in and make it inoperable."

Cowan, who took over temporary operation of the centre until its co-ordinator was reinstated (see story, pg. 3), says collective members did not welcome her in the centre. "I was confronted with total antagonism. I was made to feel very threatened."

At the Aug. 11 council meeting, several members of the women's centre collective expressed their anger with Cowan. One collective member, Claudia Rizzo, asked that any future contact Cowan has with the centre be in writing only.

Cowan says she'd like to patch up her relationship with the centre's members. "They see me as some horrible wicked witch up at CUSA, when I've been in the centre. I understand the struggle."

Cowan says she still plans to remain involved in the centre's activities.

"I really don't care what's happened, I'm still responsible for the centre and I'm going to be working to maintain the operation. So whether people want me involved in it or not that's too bad because I am responsible for that area and to the women of Carleton." □

Orientation machine ready to roll

by Cristin Tierney
Charlatan staff

Orientation is defined as "an introduction to a subject or situation; a briefing," according to The Concise Oxford Dictionary.

The undergraduate student association's frosh mail-out defines it as, "a mix of social, academic and general activities to make (the) transition to university a lot less stressful and much more fun."

With a budget of about $190,000 and nine full days of dawn-to-dusk activities planned, orientation week organizers say they're ready to meet the challenge of fulfilling their own definition. There will be about 3,000 frosh, or first-year students, coming to Carleton this month.

For the first time, all 450 volunteers involved in the week, which runs Sept. 4-12, were personally interviewed by an orientation committee.

This year's theme is "Carleton Nights Live," a take-off on the popular TV show Saturday Night Live. Frosh are divided into 15 groups with names taken from the show's most popular sketches.

The activities for the week include volleyball at Mooney's Bay, giant Twister games, Sumo wrestling, a jello slide and a Velcro wall. The highlight of this year's frosh week, at a cost of $10,000 U.S., will be Chris Rock of Saturday Night Live fame.

Orientation commissioner Richard Stanton says the orientation committee wanted this year's week to deal with other important issues. In addition to the party nature of frosh week, the committee organized seminars discussing date rape and homophobia. In short, Stanton says, they're stressing awareness.

Brenda Kennedy, co-ordinator of the Foot Patrol, is sceptical about the new focus on awareness.

"There's too much emphasis on partying and drinking. It's an unsafe atmosphere for women. When I was a frosh all we did was party."

Kennedy says it will take more than a different focus.

"How do you change those attitudes? You can't undo years of tradition."

Peter Nogalo, co-ordinator of the Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Centre, says attitudes during orientation week are progressively getting better year by year. He says more can be done but the seminars are a positive first step.

The money to pay for orientation activities came from several sources. Stanton says he expects about $130,000 in revenue from frosh kit sales. The kit includes a T-shirt and a wristband which admits frosh to all activities.

About $20,000 of the budget comes from sponsorships, including $7,000 from the university administration, $5,000 from Coca-Cola, and $2,000 from Molson. Domino's pizza will provide free food for one of the days.

The remainder of the costs of orientation — about $32,000 — will be paid by the Carleton University Students' Association. Stanton says this is about $18,000 less than CUSA paid for last year's orientation.

While most of the budget and attention got lavished on first-year students, other groups on campus have designed their own brand of orientation.

More break ins in Unicentre

by Karin Jordan

The Foot Patrol office was illegally entered two weekends in a row in August, according to the patrol's co-ordinator.

Brenda Kennedy says her office on the fourth floor of the Unicentre building was entered on the weekends of Aug. 21 and Aug. 28. She says there were no signs of forced entry, which leads her to believe it must have been someone with access to a key for her office.

Lucy Watson, president of the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA), says several people have access to master keys to all areas of the Unicentre, including herself and the building operations manager, CUSA's administrative director Rosemary Ryan, and the department of university safety.

Watson says past Foot Patrol co-ordinators may also still have access to the office, because the lock on the office hasn't been changed since the patrol first moved in two years ago.

Kennedy says she knew her office had been entered after the Aug. 21 weekend because "my filing cabinet was open and had been rifled through." A box of business cards on her desk was also overturned. Nothing was removed from her office.

Kennedy says she didn't report the first incident right away because she thought "the cleaners had done it."

On Saturday, Aug. 28, Kennedy says she received a threatening call on the Foot Patrol answering machine. Someone said "fuck you all" in a distorted voice, she says.

Kennedy says her office was also entered later that weekend, either Saturday evening or sometime on Sunday, because her box of cards was overturned for the second time and a basket of documents had been "rifled through."

Again, nothing was taken.

Kennedy reported the incidents to the department of university safety, Carleton's security department, on Monday, Aug. 30.

The incidents have left her "scared," she says. "Someone's harassing me." Kennedy says she thinks there's a link between the threatening phone call and the disturbances in her office.

Earlier this summer, a projector was stolen from Oliver's and speakers were stolen from Porter Hall, Watson says.

She says in light of these incidents as well as other break-ins this summer to the CUSA office, the volunteer bureau and the women's centre, CUSA is looking into stepping up security for all CUSA areas. She says this may include locks opened with a code or with a magnetic pass card.

The department of university safety could not be reached for comment. □

House hunters face discrimination

by Mario Carlucci
Charlatan staff

Students looking for a place to live this year may face some unexpected obstacles, says a special assistant to the university's department of housing and food services.

Derrick Burgess says he's heard more complaints this summer about landlords discriminating against students because of their sex and race than in the three years he's worked for the department.

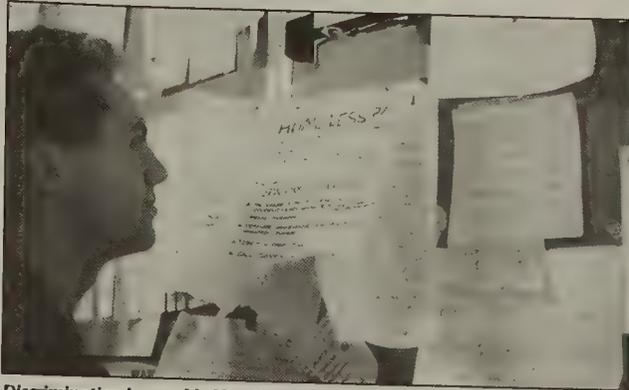

"This year, (landlords) are being more discriminatory against minorities. A lot of people are saying they want white students," says Burgess. "It's never really happened before. It's kind of discouraging."

Besides operating Carleton's residences, the department provides information and rental listings to students looking for a place off campus.

Burgess says problems for women of color may be twofold, because they're black and female. He says he spoke to one black woman looking to rent a room in a private home who was told by the landlord she was refused "because she was black."

However, because the apartment was in a shared private home with the owner — and had a shared washroom and kitchen — the Ontario Human Rights Code doesn't provide the woman with any legal protection. Burgess says he referred her to the Ottawa-Carleton Tenants' Association.

Seth Awuku, a worker at the tenants' association, agrees with Burgess that discrimination amongst some landlords has always existed.

Discrimination is an added burden in an already-tight market.

"There is a discretionary practice against minority students, single parents . . . I have received calls on that. It is a problem that is rampant in society," says Awuku.

Lisa Jamieson, a housing educator with Housing Help — a city-run service aiding people looking for housing — says she gets a lot of complaints about discrimination.

She says the biggest reason landlords discriminate against students is their low income. Other reasons include age, sex and being a new Canadian.

She says the problem of discrimination has existed for a long time and high competition for housing feeds the tendency to discriminate.

"Ottawa has the lowest vacancy rate in all of Canada for urban centres," says Jamieson.

She says Ottawa's vacancy rate is 1.8 percent — the lowest percentage of rental units vacant anywhere Canada since April 1992.

Landlords can give several reasons for not accepting a student's application and motives like racism and sexism often don't come out, says Jamieson.

Jamieson says she can't give statistics on housing discrimination because they aren't kept. But she says the problem is rampant.

Burgess says the department of housing and food services handles an average of more than 700 listings for homes and apartments. Most of them are for rooms in private homes.

He says although some landlords ask to make prejudicial listings explicitly refusing women and students of color, housing and food services has a policy of not posting them.

Holly Warden, co-ordinator of Carleton's Off-Campus Student Centre, says she hasn't received any complaints of discrimination from students she has dealt with.

"I haven't heard anything like that. I've found the landlords to be very helpful."

Ehab Shanti, co-ordinator of the International Students Centre at Carleton, handles some home listings for mainly international students, but says no student has approached him about discrimination when house-hunting.

"I've never had any students complain. In fact, some people call for international students specifically."

Shanti says landlords call him on a daily basis looking for Asian students. He says it's sometimes "a form of discrimination against Canadian-born students."

Shanti says some landlords feel Asian students and other new Canadians are quieter, neater and more dependable than other students.

Jamieson calls this a form of reverse discrimination and says that it too, is widespread. □

New Oliver's not fully accessible

by Ryan Nakashima
Charlatan staff

Renovations to one of Carleton's campus bars have left a section of it inaccessible to people who use wheelchairs.

An 18- by 16-foot area in Oliver's containing couches, tables and chairs, is raised 15 inches above the floor and has year.

Janet Burrows, Carleton Disability Awareness Centre co-ordinator, says she can't understand why the entire bar wasn't made accessible.

"If they're going to construct a new bar and market it as accessible then they should make it fully accessible," Burrows says.

CUSA finance commissioner René Faucher says "even though that part isn't accessible, 95 per cent of the bar is."

Burrows says when she looked at the half-completed bar in July, she found the inaccessible area. She says she pointed it out to Theresa Cowan, CUSA's director of services, who took the issue up with the architects.

The architects said a ramp couldn't be added without major changes like moving the bar and booths near the area. Faucher says he doesn't know how much the changes would cost or how long they would take.

Faucher says the plans won't be changed for the bar's reopening on Sept. 8. He says there was no room for the ramp needed to make the area accessible — one which is 15 feet long, one foot for every inch of elevation.

But CUSA President Lucy Watson says a lift could be installed by the end of the year to make the bar completely accessible. Watson says this plan is "still in the primitive stages."

CUSA consulted the disability awareness centre during the renovations and added accessible washrooms, a lower area at the bar, wider corridors and a ramp to another raised area.

The different raised sections were meant to make the bar seem fuller even if there were fewer people, Faucher says.

But Burrows says disabled people are often sectioned off as it is. She says she's drafting a letter to the architects questioning their intentions. Architect Peter Pivko declined to comment.

Janice Giavedoni, a master's student in social work at Carleton, says the architects failed in their responsibility to make the area completely accessible. Giavedoni uses an electric wheelchair.

George Kriticos, a computer science student, says the changes aren't necessary.

"What, do you think people aren't courteous enough to pull them up the stairs?"

Bahram Mehradfir thinks differently.

"I think they should get rid of the stairs. It's more convenient, and they (people with disabilities) can go wherever they want," says Mehradfir.

Cowan says she is willing to keep working to make the bar more accessible.

"I don't think we should be getting a pat on the back for making things as accessible as they are.

"We've done as much as possible given the time constraints, but we're still working." □ two steps leading up to it.

The Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) revamped Oliver's this summer at a cost of about $340,000, which it got through cashing in some of its investments. CUSA closed Oliver's in March after the bar lost $95,000 last

Parking prices rise for school year

by Josée Bellemare
Charlatan staff

People parking their cars at Carleton this year will have to pay an average 20 per cent more starting this month, says the chair of the university's parking committee.

Brian Tansley says the cost of a parking permit has risen as of Sept. 1, depending on which lot students, staff or faculty choose.

The biggest increases are for parking permits for the library lot, the library garage and the athletics lot. A full-time pass for the lot outside the library and the library parking garage will rise to $605 from $550.

The cost for the lot near the athletics building will rise to $343 from $233. For the lot near residence, the cost will rise to $234.30 from $213.

Cheryle Levert, a student at Carleton who used Lot 3 last year, is angry about the price increase.

"I feel it's outrageous and it's an injustice for all Carleton students," she says. "I think it's too expensive and the parking lot I was in was just too darn far away."

All exterior parking lot passes at the University of Ottawa cost $506 for the academic year. Garage parking passes cost $791.

Phil Gore, assistant director of administrative services for parking, says the deposit for people parking in a university lot after 5:30 p.m. was also increased to $10 from $8 as of Sept. 1.

Last year it cost $1.60 every hour and 80 cents every half hour to park in most university lots, excluding the refundable deposit. This year, the price will rise to $2 every hour and $1 every half hour.

Gore says the night deposit is scaled, so someone entering a lot later in the evening will pay a smaller deposit than someone entering the lot at 5:30 p.m.

Carleton parkers will shell out more this year.

A parking attendant who wished to remain anonymous says night deposits were introduced last year because students were cheating the system.

"People were coming in at 5:30 p.m. and had a class until 9:30 p.m. and would stay in there until after we put the gates up (at 10:30 p.m.) to go home," he says.

By waiting until after lot attendants left, students didn't have to pay their parking bill, he says.

Not only is parking getting more expensive, it's getting harder to find.

An addition to the Herzberg building infringes on the temporary lot near the Steacie building and the new day-care centre cuts into Lot 3 by the athletics building. Together, these will eliminate 95 parking spaces this year.

Gore says next year the Carleton University Development Corporation's technology and training centre will be built on another part of Lot 3, meaning a loss of 200 spaces. Presently there are about 3,500 parking spaces on campus.

Tansley says people don't want to see green spaces destroyed when new buildings are built, so that's why buildings are taking over campus parking lots.

He says users have to pay the whole bill for their spots.

"Anybody who parks on campus has to help pay for the system," he says. "There's no subsidies from the province for parking."

Tansley says it costs $2.5 million a year to run the parking lots at Carleton.

He says money has been set aside to build another parking garage in Lot 4 on University Drive near the maintenance building in a couple of years.

Gore says he will be against an increase in parking prices in the 1994-95 year.

"I think it would be mad," he says. "I will strongly suggest no."

The parking attendant says he received complaints from students all year because of the $8 deposit. He says this year, the shock will be worse.

"They're going to freak out more this year, I betcha." □

PCBs drained from Unicentre

by Margaret Wilson
Charlatan staff

A coolant containing PCBs was drained from two electrical transformers in the Unicentre Aug. 21-22, leaving the building without power for the weekend.

John Jones, an administrator at Carleton's physical plant, says people in the Unicentre weren't in danger of coming into contact with the toxic PCBs during removal.

"The stuff was removed through the tunnel, but there were barricades and the PCBs were in sealed steel drums."

Jones says the two transformers were the last of eight on campus to have their PCB (polychlorinated biphenyl) coolant replaced by perchloroethylene or "Perc."

Perc is a chemical related to dry-cleaning fluid and should not need to be replaced during the transformers' lifespan, says Jones.

Jones says Perc is easier to dispose of than PCBs, although it's still a health hazard. "You wouldn't want to drink it, it's a toxic fluid."

PCBs are generally unpopular due to their persistence in the environment and their tendency to accumulate in the fatty tissues of animals and humans. PCB waste must be incinerated at extremely high temperatures, whereas waste Perc can be disposed using regular chemical waste procedures.

Jones says the transformers in the Unicentre had been emptied of their original coolant by Saturday morning. The power remained off though, while seals in the transformers were replaced with ones that won't be degraded by the new coolant.

Not all of the PCBs have been removed. Jones says they will be removed gradually over a six-month period by gently heating the Perc.

In 1980, government regulations banned PCBs in new electrical equipment, as well as the use of new PCBs for existing equipment. More wide-scale regulations will eventually ban remaining PCBs entirely.

For this reason, physical plant's administration decided to replace the PCBs. The tab to replace them, including those in the administration building and parking garage, is about $55,000.

The PCBs have been added to 3,000 gallons which are being stored in a licensed waste container outside the maintenance building pending destruction. □

The long, hot summer in review

by Charlatan staff

Carleton is indeed the campus that never sleeps. Here's what happened while you were away spending the summer with your parents, working on your tan and (hopefully) making at least minimum wage.

CAPITALIST FOODS JACKS UP PRICES

Yep, that's right. On May 1, prices went up an average of three per cent at the Peppermill, Loeb Café, the Fit Stop, Hugo's, the Bent Coin, Mr. Sub and the tunnel snack bar near Paterson Hall.

But the price increase wasn't even. For example, a two-egg breakfast with bacon went up 20 per cent, while the price of deli toppings went down.

Capital Foods staff blamed rising operating costs and the high price of replacing stolen cutlery and china for the price increases.

OC TRANSPO JACKS UP PRICES, TOO

Big surprise. On Aug. 1, off-peak cash fares went up 20 cents to $1.50. A monthly student bus pass went up $1 to $43.50.

OC Transpo plans to increase service to campus, although service cuts are planned for other parts of the city on holidays.

And Para Transpo, which provides service for people with disabilities, will require customers to meet new eligibility guidelines because the service is overloaded right now.

But, just to confuse you even more, off-peak fares paid with tickets will still cost $1.30. Go figure.

CONVOCATION'S GONNA COST YOU, TOO

Students who want to graduate in convocation ceremonies will have to fork over $30 starting this November.

The November ceremony was cancelled last March by the university as a cost-saving measure. Many students, including representatives on the university's board of governors and the student associations, protested the decision.

In May, Carleton President Robin Farquhar decided to reinstate the fall ceremony — but at a price. Now students graduating in either the fall or the spring will have to pay a $30 "participation charge." Cancelling fall convocation would have saved the university about $40,000.

CAMPUS GETS A FACELIFT, AT A PRICE

In May, Carleton got a brand, spanking' new set of signs, new flower beds and new stairs, in time for the hoards of scholars that descended on our campus for the Learned Societies Conference.

It cost the university $133,000 for 10 road signs, 19 pathway signs and six parking lot signs. The cost of repairing a set of stairs by the Unicentre cost $25,000 and is part of an ongoing $114,000 project to renovate 11 sets of stairs around campus.

The Learned Societies paid for extra flower beds above and beyond the regular flower budget.

"WDN" TO BE WITHDRAWN FROM TRANSCRIPTS

A motion eliminating the term "withdrawn" from official transcripts was passed June 8 by the university's senate committee on admission and studies policy.

The term appears on your transcript if you withdraw from a course before the official deadline.

Committee chair professor Robert Lovejoy says the term "withdrawn" should not be published since it could be misinterpreted by officials outside of the university.

The committee is still deliberating about whether the decision will wipe WDN off transcripts prior to the 1993-94 school year. □

Fun Farquhar Fact

...everything you wanted to know about Sparky but were afraid to ask.

by Mario Carlucci and David Hodges Prophets of Doom

People have cited different reasons for the numerous woes Carleton University has faced over its 50-year history: lack of money, lack of talented students and profs, lack of interest. But have you ever considered these problems to be the work of... Satan?

Is it not possible that a school tortured with a poor academic reputation, a poorer campus landscape and arguably the poorest food at any post-secondary institution, could be the work of good old Beelzebub him/herself?

Even worse, could our fearless leader Sparky (a.k.a. Carleton President Robin Farquhar), protector of all that is virtuous on campus, have been possessed by that plundering villain we have so aptly called the Devil?

The pieces of this disturbing puzzle fit all too snugly:

Piece #1: — On a cold and windy night in the month of May, a couple of Carleton students happened upon the humble home of Sparky at 1 Linden Terrace. In the driveway was parked a dark, sinister-looking, late-model sedan with a licence plate starting with the digits 666 — the number of the Beastmaster.

As they approached the residence in question, storm clouds rose and lightning struck as a red presence lunged through flames on a collision course with the moon. Who knows what shocking possession ritual was taking place inside the house? Who knows what torturous tasks our poor, defenceless Sparky was forced to endure?

Unable to relive the shocking moments of fear and horror, the students had themselves committed and that put an end to their grisly tale. It is from them that two intrepid writers accept the torch and continue to unravel the Devil's ugly curse.

Piece #2: — Carleton campus itself. Monstrous pseudo-post-Neo-Gothic buildings strategically (and Satanically) placed on a landscape oozing with the murkiness of Danté's literary soul. Take for example the swamp near the St. Patrick's building. Witnesses have seen this "marsh" swallow up ducks, rabbits and even large sheepdogs in a furious and fleeting battle to suck life from God's kin.

Piece #3 — Take as well, the mighty, muddy, and downright scummy Rideau River, so innocuously located at the school's south end. Does it not bear striking similarity to the famed mythical rivers of the Underworld, where goddesses of doom ferried the unlucky to their purgatorious fates? Oh so symbolic.

What now must we do to eliminate ourselves from the inevitable? How may we extricate ourselves from the bowels of Hell? How can we absolve ourselves as minions of Satan, to lead more virtuous and honorable lives?

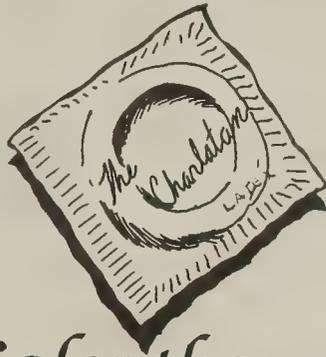

Obviously, this is bigger than all of us mere student mortals. But maybe, just maybe, there is a chance that our mighty Sparkster can fight the power and overcome the forces of Evil incarnate. Perhaps there will indeed be hope for the hopeless and life for the lifeless. Take heart Carleton, Sparky does have the Power! Let us pray. □

Improved bus service to Carleton

New! Route 19 starts Sept. 7

Route 19 Riverside is a new route serving Carleton. It will leave Lebreton in the morning every 15 minutes between 7:35 a.m. and 9:08 a.m. and will follow the same route on campus as the route 7. In the afternoon peak hours it will leave campus every 15 minutes between 3:52 p.m. and 5:55 p.m. and return to Lebreton. This new route is a fast and convenient way to connect to the transitway at Lebreton station.

New! More service on route 118

On weekdays, route 118 will run twice as often on campus as the 117 formerly did. And route 118 will also serve the campus on weekends.

Other service

Route 7 travels through campus. All-day route 4 stops at Bronson and Sunnyside as do peak period routes 41, 44 and 46.

Only $1.45 a day!

A student Transpass costs $43.50 a month. If you use it every day that amounts to just $1.45 a day for unlimited bus travel at any time.

If you pay cash, the one-way off-peak fare is $1.50 or two 65¢ bus tickets. The peak fare is $2.00 or three tickets. Express fares cost more. Peak fare hours are weekdays from 6-8:30 a.m. and 3-5:30 p.m.

To get the student deal, you must be a full-time student. You need both a monthly student pass and an OC Transpo student photo ID.

You can buy your 1993-94 ID on campus in the Baker Lounge on September 14, 15 and 16 from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. It costs $3.50.

If these dates aren't convenient, you can also buy a student photo ID at any of OC Transpo's three public offices. Call 741-4390 for info such as what you need to bring, the hours and location of the office nearest to you.

Quick travel tip

If you're busing to Carleton from the east, get off at Hurdman station, transfer to route 96 or 97 to Billings Bridge, then take the 118 to Carleton. This is quicker than travelling downtown to Bank Street and transferring to route 7.

Campbell outlines education proposal

by Brent Dowdall
Charlatan Staff

Reaction was mixed to Prime Minister Kim Campbell's Aug. 16 speech in Kitchener, which outlined Conservative proposals for education as part of the fall federal election.

Campbell outlined nine proposals for education reform, including a new education tax credit, assistance for young entrepreneurs and a $1 billion increase in funding to the Canada Student Loan program over four years.

If implemented, Campbell's proposals would reallocate at least $250 million of the federal education budget to new programs. As well, some old programs like Canada Student Loans will receive increased funding.

"As governments, we spend more per capita on education and training than virtually any other country, some $55 billion a year," Campbell said in her speech. "The answer is not spending more, it's spending smarter."

Campbell has not released specific information on where the reallocated money will come from, or details of how much new money will be injected into old programs.

The changes would include an increase in student loan limits to $5,100 a year from the current $3,500, or $150 per week. It would also increase loan limits for part-time students to $4,000 a year from $2,500.

As well, the $80-per-month tax credit for full-time students would be increased an unspecified amount to be determined by the federal minister of finance. The tax credits would also be extended to part-time students.

Tom Van Dusen, Campbell's press secretary, said no new money would be spent on any new programs and these would be formed in consultation with the provinces.

"The new programs are a reallocation of funds," Van Dusen said.

He also said the programs' details will be worked out with the departments in question over an unspecified period of time.

Ron Duhamel, the Liberal education critic, said the Conservatives have wasted plenty of opportunities during their time to make positive changes to education.

"It's a death bed repentance," said Duhamel. "I'm sorry, but they have no credibility and no one believes Kim Campbell unless they are dyed-in-the-wool Tories."

But Carleton University business professor Ian Lee, the Progressive Conservative candidate in Ottawa-Centre, said Campbell's speech was "a good first step."

Lee said universities should move to trimester and co-op programs, where full classes are offered all 12 months of the year, like the University of Waterloo and Carleton's school of public administration. He said such programs would spread out the student population over the year, mean fewer students in the job market in the summer and make better use of university buildings.

PM Campbell: nine points of light?

FILE

Lee said an increase in funding for education is unrealistic. He cited Ontario as an example, where the three different provincial parties in power have reduced education funding in the past decade.

"That suggests to me that there is no money left," Lee said.

Carol Fleck, Carleton's director of student awards, said she believes the Conservatives can and will live up to pledges made by Campbell for student loan changes.

"This is the first time I've ever seen anything this definite," she said.

Carl Gillis, chair of the Canadian Federation of Students, said while he was encouraged to hear Campbell talking about student issues, he said he's not convinced they are any more than election promises. He said Campbell should act on her proposals now while she has the power as government leader.

"I can't help but think that these are promises," he said. "As encouraging as it is, you have to ask why we should believe them."

Gillis said the Tories still "have to answer for their past."

Duhamel said Liberal education policy will be announced after the election is called.

He described general policy ideas, such as an increase in research and development, a youth corps to assist in environmental clean-up and a renegotiation of education transfer payments to the provinces in three- to five-year blocks, instead of yearly.

He said he could not give any more details of the Liberal education plan so as not to upstage party leader Jean Chretien's future policy announcements. □

Just the facts, ma'am

Here are some key points from Kim Campbell's speech Aug. 16 in Kitchener, which outlined proposed new programs and expanded existing ones. Campbell said the Tories would:

- continue the Brighter Futures Program and a Community Action Program which assist children, families and local groups "at risk." ($168 million over four years)
- donate all old government computer systems to Canadian schools.
- continue a program called SchoolNet which would link 300 Canadian schools by computer with the goal of connecting every school in the country. This program is being co-ordinated at Carleton. ($1.6 million)
- study the most successful 20 Canadian schools to find out why they are successful. ($1.5 million)
- increase the education tax credit for full-time study an unspecified amount and grant it to part-time students as well. The student deduction for child care would also be increased.

- renew the Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Agreement with the provinces, which assists Canadians with disabilities with training, medical aids, counselling and other services. ($517 million over four years)
- provide start-up loans, training and advice for young entrepreneurs to start 200 new businesses, creating 800 jobs. ($2.5 million)
- continue Canada Student Loan reform. As well as increased loan limits, the government would offer "interest relief" to the neediest students. There would be more assistance for single parents and increased pursuit of loan defaulters by banks.
- increase the representation of women in Canadian doctoral programs in areas such as math, science and engineering. □

Fees should be raised report recommends by Sarah Morris

Charlatan Staff

A proposal by a group representing university administrations suggests Ontario universities hike tuition by up to 50 per cent by the 1995-96 school year.

Last month, the Council of Ontario Universities forwarded a "Discussion Paper on Tuition Fee Reform" to David Cooke, Ontario's minister of education and training, calling for students to take on more of the burden of university funding.

Under the proposal, undergraduate students would pay 30 per cent more tuition over the next two years. Thus, the maximum fee a university can charge for undergraduate programs would rise to $3,030 in two years from $2,026 this year.

Graduate programs would cost 50 per cent more, rising to $4,545 from $3,051 over the same period. Students in many professional programs like medicine, dentistry and law would be billed nearly three times as much as they are now, up to a maximum of $6,061 per year.

The provincial government has raised the ceiling for tuition fee hikes in Ontario seven per cent each of the past three years.

The NDP government has yet to comment on the plan, but Cooke has warned students to be prepared for "substantial" tuition fee increases for 1994-95. Cooke will announce the increase in the fall.

The council, an independent body made up of representatives from Ontario universities including Carleton, points to the ability of university graduates to earn higher incomes as the main rationale behind the proposal.

Michel Gaulin, clerk of the senate at Carleton and one of the university's two representatives on the council, voted against submitting the council's proposal to the government.

He says the main reason for his opposition was that the council adopted the report in the summer when students were away.

"There was little consultation with the student community," he says.

Gaulin says he was "generally in agreement with the general idea of the paper."

Pat Adams, the council's director of communications and public affairs, defends the proposal because of the "critical" financial situation of Ontario universities.

"With the demand for university education escalating and the funding being drastically cut, universities are forced to look at their only other source of funding if they are going to improve the quality of education," says Adams.

But Carl Gillis, chair of the Canadian Federation of Students (CFS), disagrees.

"I find it rather incredible that someone would suggest that students pay for 10 to 20 years of underfunding," Gillis says, noting that the quality of education will not rise proportionately with tuition fees.

The council's proposal also recommends changes to the student loan system to maintain accessibility despite the dramatic increase in fees.

Under the proposed loan system, called income-contingent repayment loans, students would have access to government loans without having to demonstrate their level of financial need, as they currently must.

Once they have finished their education, students would pay back their loans based on their income after graduation. Thus, a person unable to find a job or with a poorly paying job would not have to pay their loan back right away.

Even though the council is also proposing student loan reform, Gillis says students will still suffer.

"It's a regressive way to fund universities," says Gillis.

He says the system will still deter lower-income students who are unwilling to incur a massive debt load. He also says those earning less after graduation will be punished with ever-mounting interest.

A CFS study of similar loan programs in Australia and Switzerland shows the systems there have not resulted in improved access, says Gillis.

He says the CFS-Ontario will submit a counter-proposal to the government before a decision is reached by the NDP on tuition hikes.

Gillis says students should not be as upset with the council's proposal as with the NDP government's positive reaction to the idea of tuition hikes.

"Since its inception 20 years ago, (the council) has been proposing hikes in tuition fees," says Gillis. "The frightening thing is, the government's listening this time." □

Halifax school newspaper's funding slashed

by Alex Bustos
Charlatan Staff

News that Mount Saint Vincent University's student council has stopped funding the school's newspaper and is establishing a new one under its control marks the second crisis between a paper and a student government this summer.

In July, The Ubysses paper clashed with its student union at the University of British Columbia when the council suspended its funding and locked the staff out of their office.

The Picaro has been the Halifax university's student publication funded by council for 25 years. However, the paper will have no funding starting this month after the student council declared it autonomous in March.

Paula Adanski, last year's editor, said the conflict began with an article published in January. The story mentioned allegations that then-president Dave Wynn and vice-president Cathy Thorpe abused alcohol at a public charity event called Christmas Daddies.

Adanski said the story embarrassed the councillors, who then passed a motion on Feb. 12 establishing a selections committee, chosen by council, to select the paper's next editor.

The Picaro's own constitution calls for the election by staff of the editors, with voting privileges going to anyone who has contributed at least twice to the paper.

According to the motion implementing the selections committee, it was set up to "open the position of Picaro editor to the wider university community," as the post is open to anyone at the school. Thorpe, who is now the council president, said the motion was not vengeful on the part of council.

"I don't give two hoots about an article printed about me in January," she said.

But on March 26, council rescinded the February motion and replaced it with one making The Picaro "autonomous from the student union in every way." The staff, along with the summer council ties between itself and The Picaro because of complaints from students about the content of the paper. Some students complained of inadequate coverage of such things as women's issues and found the people involved with the paper to be a clique, according to Thorpe.

Then, during summer negotiations between the paper and council, some

On Aug. 8, the student council ratified the constitution of the new publication, as yet unnamed. The new paper will be eligible for funding from the student council as the university's official paper.

The new paper's constitution establishes a publishing board, consisting of the presidents of the 21 societies funded by student council, the paper's editor and a council representative. This body would have the power to hire and fire newspaper staff and set editorial policy.

The editor must be approved by a selections committee, consisting of two council members, two students at large and one alumnus.

The Picaro has found support as members of the national student newspaper co-operative, the Canadian University Press (CUP).

In a letter to Thorpe dated Aug. 11, CUP President Alayne Armstrong wrote, "I'd like to point out what the situation looks like to an outsider: the student council is criticized by The Picaro; it squeezes off The Picaro's funding; it ratifies the constitution of another paper which has its editors chosen by a board consisting of student councillors and society executives with no representatives from the paper whatsoever."

But Thorpe rejected the notion that the student council is controlling the new paper. She said the publishing board will make the position of editor more accessible to the general population.

In July, a similar publishing board was set up for The Ubysses. Any paper wishing to publish on UBC's campus must go through this board to receive funding.

members, were supposed to "negotiate an agreement equitable to both sides."

Bob Ledrew, incoming co-editor of The Picaro, said the council was prepared to give $7,400 to the paper at the first summer negotiation meeting. Ledrew said this is well below the paper's normal operating budget, about $15,000.

Thorpe said council voted to sever the students who were dissatisfied with The Picaro's coverage proposed to start a new paper under a new constitution.

Representatives of six different societies on campus have created the new paper, including members of the English Society and the Women's Studies Society.

Thorpe said neither she nor council are behind the new paper.

Freenet conference

On-ramp to the new communication highway

by Michael Richardson
Charlatan Staff

"Networking is about communication, people communicating," as one student doing a demonstration of new computer technology at the Community Networking Conference put it.

Russell McOrmond, a computer science student at Carleton, was one of about 150 people from across Canada and the United States who came to Carleton to communicate about computer networking Aug. 18-20.

At the conference, organized by National Capital Freenet volunteers, delegates exchanged ways to set up, fund and maintain freenet systems in their own communities.

Freenets are computer information networks set up by individual groups who solicit funding for them so anyone with a computer and a modem can access computer bulletin boards and information free of charge.

Kyla Huckerby, the National Capital Freenet office manager, helped organize the conference.

"We could have been there for a whole week just talking and exchanging ideas. Everyone went home with lots of new ideas," she says.

Ottawa's freenet, only a year old, was the first one in Canada and one of the first five ever established. It now has over 6,000 users.

Many organizations, associations and clubs post information on freenet bulletin boards. But unlike a rack of pamphlets, readers can ask questions, offer feedback and send messages.

The average experience with media is already "synthetic — electronic, through TVs, radios," says Sam Sternberg, chair of the Toronto Freenet Committee. "Even the content of most newspapers comes over the wire."

The original push to build the Ottawa freenet came from Carleton. The idea came from psychology professor Warren Thorngate and associate journalism professor Jay Weston, and was co-ordinated by computing services' director David Sutherland.

While everyone is free to access the system and register for an account, Carleton students, numbering over 20,000, would completely overwhelm the freenet system if they all wanted to use it.

Universal student access to electronic communications is mostly dependent on funding from the university.

A request has been made for Challenge Fund money to buy the extra computers needed to accommodate the Carleton population, although the cost of the project is still unclear. The Challenge Fund was established in 1987 to raise money for projects at Carleton.

Graduate students presently have full access, by request, to freenet accounts.

Huckerby says she receives between 60 and 100 calls a day from people looking for information or help with Ottawa's freenet system.

It has been supported by quite a number of donations from private industry, as well as some grant money from different levels of governments. Huckerby hopes user donations will pick up, although she says there will always be open, equal access.

"Government funding will run out," says Huckerby. "We have to look towards business and the community for support."

But Sternberg isn't looking to the government for hand-outs.

"A freenet can provide large access to controversial information," he says. "As soon as you get bureaucracies involved, their natural instinct is to filter information."

Sternberg gives a hypothetical example of how a freenet system might allow a woman to connect to another freenet in another province or country in order to get information on abortion if it became illegal where she lived.

Huckerby and Sternberg make many comparisons between the freenet concept and public libraries. They say the name "freenet" is derived from the word "freeway," as a communally funded means of travel and as a building block for future "information highways." □

The University of Ottawa's student federation is dealing with the sudden departure of one its executive members.

Christophe Treville, vice-president of internal operations at the Student Federation of the University of Ottawa, tendered a letter of resignation Aug. 23.

In it, Treville said his job with a local food company did not allow him to fully dedicate himself to his position as vice-president. He also cited the "uncooperative atmosphere" among the executive as a reason for leaving.

Treville's departure this close to the new school year has caused concern over planned frosh activities and the operation of the federation's used bookstore, areas he was responsible for.

"We're getting ready for Welcome Week, so he left at a bad time," said federation President Guy Caron. He said other members of the executive will fill in for Treville until a replacement can be found.

Other members of the four-person executive were surprised by the resignation, but didn't express regret either.

"The three of us got along fine. I feel there was a certain lack of dedication on his part," said Carole Sauvé, the vice-president external.

Executive members were also upset because he did not inform them about a major university senate decision this summer, when it ruled new students who fail a test in their second official language won't be required to take a course to make up the deficiency.

"He deemed it unimportant to tell us," said Sauvé.

Caron says this decision threatens the bilingual character of the university.

Caron said it hasn't been decided if a replacement will be hired or directly elected by U of O students. The student assembly will decide when it meets at the end of September if a byelection will be held to fill the vacant position.

Treville is on vacation and could not be reached for comment. □

Dave Matthews, CUP's Atlantic region co-ordinator, said CUP only recognizes The Picaro as the official paper at Mount Saint Vincent.

The Dalhousie university student paper, The Gazette, also came to The Picaro's defence.

The Gazette's editor Ryan Stanley sent a letter denouncing the actions of the Mount Saint Vincent student council. As well, The Gazette has offered the use of its facilities to The Picaro's staff this fall.

Ledrew said he's waiting for an emergency meeting with the student council to discuss possible funding for The Picaro.

Ledrew said the paper hopes to publish somehow by mid-September.

Canada's summer in review: a brief synopsis

by Arn Keelling
Charlatan Staff

Did you spend your summer locked up in your parents' basement playing Nintendo or working in an isolated resort in the Canadian Rockies? Is the last time you read a newspaper when the Habs won the Stanley Cup?

Never fear, here's the latest scoop on summer happenings on the national scene:

In the student world, unemployment was once again a prominent problem this summer, as the student jobless rate was over 20 per cent for the second year in a row.

In July, the federal government announced Canada Student Loans would no longer be subject to the three-per-cent clawback tax as of Aug. 1 this year. But the feds axed the six-month interest-free period on loans at the same time and they save a bundle on the proposition.

Out in Lotusland, Mike Harcourt's NDP government landed in hot water as our best corporate citizens, MacMillan Bloedel, began selectively logging one of the last stands of old-growth forests on Vancouver Island. The Clayoquot Sound decision has precipitated a mass movement of Birkenstock-wearin' hippie types to the West Coast to get arrested while trying to block the loggers' access to the area. Which is fine.

Our Alberta brethren stuck to their authoritarian roots by electing yet another Conservative premier, as they have in every election since 1971. This time, Ralph Klein, a former mayor of Calgary, swept to victory and pounded the provincial NDP into oblivion.

Prairie people complained all year of too much rain, after not enough last year. What is it with these people? At least they haven't all moved out to Vancouver like the unemployed southern Ontarians.

Looking east, the view of the Atlantic got a little bleaker as a moratorium was declared early this summer on the cod fishery.

Of course, Ottawa and Ontario were abuzz with exciting political machinations. The national Progressive Conservative party leadership convention descended on Ottawa in June, releasing hundreds of drunken Tories and resulting in Canada's first female, Russian-speaking, cello-playing, kinda-tried-pot-once prime minister, Avril Phaedra Campbell.

The provincial NDP brought down its social contract in August, an agreement with the province's public sector employees, including universities, to cut back wages, lay off employees and close government offices for unpaid days off. This sparked mass celebrations and incredible popularity for the government and its leader, Bob Rae. Not.

Yes, the wild world of politics and national affairs has been as busy as ever this summer. So if you had a summer job, like Kim Campbell, you'd best catch up. Things will get even stranger this fall. □

Bob Rae even made himself sick this summer.

"I urge you to take the fullest advantage of these opportunities along with those offered throughout our wonderful national capital region."

- Carleton University president and sharp dresser Robin "Sparky" Farquhar, on the fine services offered at Carleton and in this fair city, quoted in the CUSA 1993 Orientation Mail-Out.

Words to live by, as far as we're concerned. In fact, we've devoted the best years of our lives to following the wise one's advice.

The City of Ottawa in general and Carleton University in particular do have lots to offer, but the only place you'll find out about the fun stuff is right here in the Official Charlatan Frosh Guide to Ottawa.

We're not talking about the Rideau Canal or the Tulip Festival or the Parliament Buildings; you can save those for when your parents visit. We're talking about body-abusing fun on the cheap.

We've done our best to let you know about the best places in town to get free food, where to get your thrills for cheap, what bars to frequent and which ones to avoid.

Plus, we've included an easy to read, Handi-Save™ map, suitable for framing.

Whatever you decide to do with your university life, don't let the bastard institutions drag you down to the level of a pissing ant. And hey, let's be careful out there. □

How to make friends and influence people

The Charlatan's handy 10-point, 12-step guide

by David Hodges and Mike Rappaport
Charlatan Staff

So you're lonely and maybe you're a bit of a loser. Well, don't despair. Making friends isn't always easy — especially in a new environment — but what you are about to read will forever change your life.

Now hold on, we know what you're thinking, "I've tried other so-called methods for making friends before, but they never work. Afterward, I feel even more dejected and crappy."

These are legitimate gripes. The majority of these methods rely upon age-old techniques that are out of touch with today's modern student.

For instance, maybe you've heard of, or even tried, the old "Poke and Tease" method where you continually poke and tease someone with a stick, or prodding object. The belief was that this would eventually endear you to that person. Our research shows that this method does not work. More than likely it will leave you friendless, with a stick or prodding object lodged up your ass.

This method, and many others like it, have continually left people friendless and miserable.

But now, using a life's worth of accumulated wisdom, scientific techniques approved by the Canada Safety Association, various complicated models and mathematical equations, we have formulated a 10-step plan that will enhance your amicable aura, drawing friends to you like bees to honey.

1) Brag about how much money you have and how high above your surroundings you are.

This never fails to impress. By letting people know how superior you are to them, they will be amazed and left speechless by your selfless action of lowering yourself to their level.

2) Give people cute nicknames.

Lumpy is always a crowd pleaser.

3) Remember, you can pick your friends and you can pick your nose, but you can't pick your friends' noses.

This should be obvious.

4) Just keep hugging people.

Somebody is bound to like it. If that doesn't work, wear a button that reads, "Hug me, I'm Irish."

5) Drink like a fish.

The ability to be both an alcoholic and a university student is a sure way to impress people with your multi-dimensional personality: Monday night, The Royal Oak; Tuesday night, Zaphod Beeblebrox; Wednesday night, Oliver's; Thursday night, Yucatan Liquor Stand;

Friday night, On Tap; Saturday night, Houlihan's; Sunday night, drink moderately, do homework.

6) Tell people you have a car.

7) Raise your hand to ask questions during lectures.

8) When you pass acquaintances in the tunnels and they say, "Hi, how are you," tell them in graphic detail.

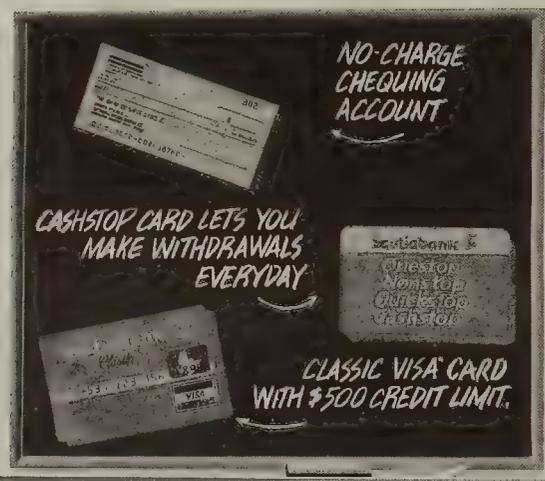

9) Make sound effects to accompany all your movements.

Remember the bionic man? He was so cool.

10) Carry a large block of cheese around with you.

If there's one thing people can appreciate, it's cheese.

If however, this program doesn't work for you, don't come whining to us. ☐

Ottawa: home of the best damn music in Canada

Ottawa's live music scene is thriving. Furnaceface have finally arrived in a major way, being signed to MCA, and several other bands have been picked up by Cargo, an MCA subsidiary.

These bands are pro. There's a great diversity among the bands, from the polished hard rock of The Age of Faith to the happy, loud-guitar emocore of Heaven Dog to the laid-back sounds of Fun For Malakai.

Spacing restrictions don't allow even a brief description of each band. Likewise, this list is by no means complete.

There's something for everyone, so support live music in Ottawa and don't miss these bands.

Enjoying your Orientation

by Rori Caffrey
Charlatan Staff

Your frosh year—a time of education, maturation and... exploration.

First year is traditionally a "coming out" time for non-heterosexuals. It's an opportunity for young queers to pry open the closet door and escape the confines of parents and/or small-town mentalities.

But first year can also be a difficult and dangerous time for out-and-proud dykes and fags. Carleton has witnessed homophobia on campus, through graffiti in the washrooms or rhymes found in a rugby team chant book last year.

Frosh week can be an especially painful trial for the non-het. Last year, comedians Mike Wilmot and Tim Steves made offensive jokes about homosexuals and incest survivors that reduced some students to tears. Despite being strongly discouraged, homophobic comments have been heard within different frosh groups in the past.

But fear not, my queer comrade! Below is a list of suggestions of how you, despite your re-hashed summer camp surroundings, can enjoy your orientation week.

FROSH WEEK

First off, don't take any shit. This is good advice for anyone. If you're catching homophobic heat from other frosh (in the form of cheers or comments or whatever), tell your head facilitator—the upper-year student in charge of your frosh group. They have been trained to curb any racist, sexist or homophobic behavior.

If the problems persist, go straight to Richard Stanton, the orientation commissioner. He can be reached through the office of the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA).

Frosh week comedians may resort to "fag jokes" for cheap laughs. By all means, don't let this deter you from attending a concert! Just be sure to go well-armed with snappy heckles.

After an offensive joke, it may suffice to yell "One in 10 people in this crowd are gay and we didn't find that funny!" or "AIDS jokes died with Freddy Mercury!" That may hit home with the masses of Wayne's World/Bohemian Rhapsody disciples.

If the homophobic jokes continue, bring out the big guns. Yes, it's low, it's infantile, but they gave you no option but to start... the father jokes: "Funny, your dad doesn't seem to mind!" or "I don't think my boyfriend—I mean, your dad, would appreciate you saying that!"

Dykes can really sock it to the male homophobe by taking a shot at his girlfriend. Yelling: "She's found somebody she doesn't have to fake orgasm with," may reinforce the myth that women become lesbians after disappointing encounters with men, but it does get the point across.

As far as music goes, check out the fag-friendly Furnaceface Sunday, Sept. 5, in the parking lot behind the Unicentre. Their song "Can't Help Who You Love" has been mistaken as a gay anthem. Although none of the band's members are gay (sob), they don't mind the tune's homo-interpretation.

Remember at all times that CUSA is paying for orientation week with $32,000 of your money. You are paying to be entertained, not insulted.

UNIVERSITY LIFE

Residence is like a huge Petri dish which breeds ignorance and hatred—definitely a dangerous place to be out. Unless you want to lose a roommate, or assure private usage of the communal washroom, stay low-key. Don't lie or attempt to hide your pride—just wait a little before breaking out the Judy Garland albums.

Despite their homoerotic initiation rites and Greek brotherhood overtones, fraternities are bad news. Generally, they're not gay-positive. Avoid them like the plague.

Tune in to "People Like You," the weekly queer news show on CKCU, Carleton's campus radio station. It airs Wednesday at 6:30 p.m.

The university also has a Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Centre on the first floor of the Unicentre, just past the off-campus lounge. Check it out for pamphlets, periodicals and community events.

A WORD FOR EVERYONE

Taking a public stand against homophobia is a difficult task, especially for frosh. You're new, you need friends, you don't want to rock the boat.

But you—straights included—must decide what type of environment you want your academic career to take place in. Speaking up against anti-gay sentiments won't magically change anyone's attitude, but it will let them know they have a vocal opposition. It will make them think.

So if that boat does need a good rocking, feel free to make some waves. □

Sifting through the rabble: Bars in Ottawa

by Josée Bellemare
Charlatan Staff

Although the trendier dance bars in Ottawa can be pathetic, it's important to remember they are best experienced when drunk.

Me, I've lived in Ottawa all my life and have been going to bars for four years. I started drinking just this year because of the deep boredom I felt frequenting these establishments for so long.

Students coming here from other cities may find Ottawa bars a fresh experience at first, but I'm sure after a while even the most sober of you will take up drinking. On the other hand, if you're coming from Toronto, good luck finding anything abnormal or interesting.

Cafe Deluxe (283 Dalhousie) is a nice but pretentious place, suitable for sipping cappuccino and talking with people sporting sideburns and Club Monaco clothing.

Wednesdays are the domain of On Tap (160 Rideau). This is a favored university hangout, mainly because of its famous buck a draft. The music is a mixture of everything, but mostly rock and roll. There's also a large pool room upstairs.

For those who like their nights out to be a little less intellectual, check out the Yucatan Liquor Stand, Houlihan's, or Spo-dee Od-ee's.

At Yucatan's (34 Clarence) you'll hear talk of relationships, one night stands, school or jobs, and plans to meet elsewhere the same night or the next day. Tuesdays is the most popular day since you pay just over $2 for most drinks.

Houlihan's (110 York) has a slightly older crowd. The DJ's usually play new releases but tend to stick to old dance music. The busiest nights are Friday through Monday.

Spo-dee Od-ee's (130 York) features a dance floor and a pool hall. The bar used to be popular last winter, but has since died down.

If you think these clubs are meat markets, wait until you step into Indigo (360 Elgin). This place is out of hand. Married, divorced, and single people go to this bar to watch or to be watched.

On the plus side, the drinks are strong, the music is more current than most and people dance -- not only on the dance floor, but also on the patio, the balcony inside and on top of the actual bar.

Warning: be prepared to stand in long line-ups. All of these bars I spoke about usually have line-ups down the road, sometimes five people thick. The only way to conquer the system is to know the bouncers or the owners, or have a VIP card. If you don't, you may want to start your night kinda early. ☐

JOE NORMINTON

Where to eat, where to drink

Bagel Bagel (92 Clarence) Bagels + open 24 hours (Fridays and Saturdays) = fun!

Club SAW (67 Nicholas) It's a small room and the sound isn't that great, but the local bands that play there more than make up for these shortcomings.

Creeque Alley (207 Rideau) The best thing about this room is the atmosphere. Its wooden interior resembles a large cottage. The sound is excellent and there's nothing blocking the stage.

Duke of Somerset (352 Somerset W.) This is one of the coolest pubs in Ottawa. With its comfy couches, this Carleton hangout is more like a refurbished basement than a bar. Sundays, check out the sounds of Jimmy George, Celtic band extraordinaire. But it fills up quickly, so get there early.

Irene's (885 Bank) The Lonesome Paul legend lives on Sunday nights. You'll see. Amazing veggie burgers part of the magic.

The Manx Pub (370 Elgin) Super casual hangout for the trendy alternative set. Red velvet booths and black paintings make this place way cool. Plus, there's live Celtic music on Saturdays. It's always packed, so go before the others get there.

Mike's Place (2nd Floor Unicentre)

Cute bartender alert! The only truly mellow and cool place to hang on campus. It's run by the Graduate Students' Association, but you don't have to show your thesis at the door or anything. Just look real smart.

The Pit (160 Rideau, below On Tap) My God! Disco lives! Come share the shame of a decade with Hammerheads every Thursday. Tuesdays witness one of the funkiest music nights in town with DJ Trevor's acid jazz.

Stone Angel (314 Lisgar) Enjoy poetry, herbal tea and that communal spirit thing in Ottawa's hippie coffeehouse.

Taktiks (151 George) Ottawa's most popular gay dance club has some of the most danceable tunes in the market and some of the cutest babes in the city on the dance floor. If you're straight, don't flaunt it and no one will care that you're there. But you won't score like others do.

Zaphod Beeblebrox (27 York) The coolest bar in town for live music. Thursdays through Saturdays, from 8 p.m. until 11 p.m., they feature live music covering the entire spectrum of innovative rock. Everyone from evil rocksters Monster Magnet to the country-influenced Lost Dakotas plays here. Plus, they spin the best "alternative" music Tuesdays through Sundays. ☐

Music for the Masses: The best of

by Adam Seddon
Charlatan Staff

As in all cities, you can find large record chains in nearly all malls and shopping centres. In the downtown area, there is an abundance of chain stores where you can find mainstream music. But here's the low-down on stores if you're looking for something else:

Birdman Sound (593-B Bank) The Birdman specializes in used compact discs and vinyl but also sells brand new vinyl and CDs. It's not an overly large store but nevertheless, it is an ideal place to locate those hard-to-find underground bands or the latest release on vinyl if any pressings are put into circulation.

Bonehead Music (288 Bank) This used-record store has an impressive stock of used cassettes and rare and bootleg recordings. It also has a fair selection of used CDs and vinyl.

Downtown Records (201 Dalhousie) is the place to go for cheap discs. While they do offer a wide assortment of new CDs at very competitive prices, their used CDs are to die for. Boasting a large diverse collection, used CDs cost about $10 and can be traded in two for one. They also peddle vinyl and cassettes.

Pull-Out Guide To Ottawa

On the culture front, here's where to take your parents.

Don't let Ottawa fool you. Believe it or not, this seemingly conservative city has a thriving artistic community that extends from the National Gallery to the smaller, more alternative galleries such as Gallery 101 and the SAW Gallery.

The building which is the National Gallery is a spacious architectural wonder, well-lit by natural lighting. Outside light streams in through the numerous windows of this glass structure.

The gallery's collection has both classical and contemporary art. It's always featuring innovative special exhibitions in addition to its extensive permanent collection.

Don't forget to check out some of its controversial purchases like Voice Offire and No. 16.

main alternative galleries, featuring performance, contemporary and multi-media art that will be sure to challenge you. Housed in a basement, this gallery has a true underground feeling.

Gallery 101 (319 Lisgar) has a studio dance floor, specifically for the performance art pieces displayed here. The exhibitions and events held by this gallery usually attracts small, intimate audiences. Currently featured at this gallery is an exhibition in progress: Land Art on Victo- ria Island and Richmond Landing.

On campus, check out the Carleton Art Gallery located within the St. Patrick's building. This small gallery, which opened last September, features mostly contemporary Canadian art. Throughout the year well-known Canadians artists and their work are profiled in exhibitions. If you're in need of a mental break, visiting the gallery is a great way to get away from the hectic pace of university life. □

Cheap Ottawa eats that won't make you sick

by Doug Johnson
Charlatan Staff

Welcome to Ottawa, Canada's capital and home to some really fine restaurants.

As a university student you can forget about eating at any of them (and don't put nose prints on the glass, thank you very much).

Hy's, Cafe Henry Burger or the Rideau Club are all hangouts for the rich and powerful here in our fine city. As a student, you do not qualify.

But don't despair. We at The Charlatan are here to tell you all about the wonderful culinary adventures awaiting you in Ottawa's eateries of the poor and disenfranchised.

There are several points we've adhered to in selecting these eateries:

1) You shouldn't feel like vomiting after or before leaving the establishment. Making sidewalk pizza is not only social no-no (see vomiting etiquette, below), but it is also a waste of the five bucks you just dropped for a meal.

2) Stoking the ol' furnace shouldn't cost more than $5 ($3.50 for breakfast).

3) The restaurant receives extra points if the furniture is padded and food is not left out on the counter.

4) A further bonus if it is open all night.

5) The place gets even more points if it is licensed.

6) And it is a sure winner if you are not afraid of sitting down when you go to the loo.

Let's begin our tour of student-grade noshitoriums right here on campus. The only place on campus which gets an unanimous thumbs-up from Charlatan staff is the Oasis, on the ground floor of Glengary residence.

For about the cost of a pack of lined paper at the campus bookstore, you can get a hamburger and fries. A cheese sandwich with potato chips costs $1.30 and an added bonus is free television.

As you move off campus, the nearest low-cost place to chow down is the chip wagon, at the corner of Bank Street and Sunnyside Avenue. There, a cheeseburger with oodles of fixin's runs for $2.75, the same cost as a bratwurst on a bun from a cart on Sparks Street.

It's worth noting that chip wagons and hot dog carts can provide a low-cost alternative to the more traditional feed-o-ramas, but you have to shop around for the best prices.

An excellent belly filler is poutine — a concoction of french fries, cheese curds and gravy. It's both good and good for you. Some of the best (as well as some of the worst) poutine can be found from these eateries on wheels. But searching for the best poutine in Ottawa is an excellent way to learn your way around the city.

Moving north along Bank, the next place to nosh that won't strain your budget is the Avenue Restaurant (777 Bank) in the Glebe. It's a very bare bones place with booths and a counter with stools. The food is served out of a hatch at the back of the restaurant. A traditional cholesterol-laden breakfast costs $2.40.

Though not pricey by most standards, most of the other Glebe eateries can put a real strain on the old budget, especially if your student loan went towards something besides tuition or housing. A good try would be Irene's (885 Bank), a popular left-wing bar just north of the Civic Centre.

Continuing north, the next purveyors of low-cost edibles can be found near where Bank intersects Somerset Street. Here, one can dine at establishments such as Imperial Pizza (315 Bank) and the venerable Lockmaster (352 Somerset St. W.).

The Lockmaster scores big not only as an excellent place to grab a burger, but as a provider of some of the lowest cost beer in town. As a tavern it tends to draw a mixed crowd. Plus, there's karaoke every Wednesday night, an excellent way to pass an evening when you are really wasted.

Imperial's big draw is Mama, who owns the place. Mama is a rather lively character who will make you feel right at home. They also serve a homemade-style burger, good pizza and donairs. Again, it's good and good for you.

From Bank Street, we move on to the Byward Market in Lowertown (north of the Bay at Rideau Centre).

The market is a major draw for students, but most of its establishments can put a hole in your budget big enough to drive a truck through. However, there are three worth noting: Mellos (290 Dalhousie, open 24 hours), Cafe Wim (537 Sussex) and the Château Lafayette House (42 York).

Mellos can attract a very interesting crowd around the clock, but the best time to visit is between two and three in the morning. Here, the best bet is the clubhouse and fries with coffee.

The prices at Cafe Wim are on par with the rest of the places in the market, but it rates as a budget establishment if you want to spend the whole afternoon drinking a coffee. So if you and some friends are looking for a place to have a deep discussion about the world's problems, this is the place.

The Château Lafayette is not a place to go for food. It's only draw is that it serves the cheapest beer in Ottawa. A quart of domestic costs $4.35. The Laf has a reputation as a rough place, but most of the time we've only seen University of Ottawa students in there.

The final stops on our tour of low-cost eateries are along Elgin St. Here we have the Party Palace (252 Elgin), the Bytown Tavern (292 Elgin) and Bagel Classics (380 Elgin) to choose from.

Both the Party Palace and Bagel Classics come highly recommended by Charlatan editor-in-chief Mo Gannon. The Palace is a standard diner while Bagel Classics provides an alternative to burgers and donairs when you've got the munchies late at night. The Bytown Tavern provides traditional bar fare along with cheap beer and good wings on Tuesdays.

We round out our culinary tour of Ottawa's low-cost pit stops with a caution. It is best to avoid mall-style food courts as the quality is regularly low while the prices are routinely high. It's also best to avoid places that serve food in unique geometric designs. □

Vomiting Etiquette: how to heave in polite society

It is quite common for orang-utans to regurgitate their food and then ingest it again. This helps their digestive process. However, hairy though you may be, please remember you are several centuries removed from the orang-utan.

Vomiting etiquette may not be the most pleasant subject, but it's something you'll have to face sooner or later and you might as well know how to deal with the reality of vomiting in polite society.

1. Never vomit in YOUR sink. Although it may seem like a good idea, cleaning out a vomit-clogged sink is not the party it's made out to be.
2. Vomiting on that special someone rarley wins you points.
3. Here's an old master's trick: Keep your head tilted forward (not backwards) to avoid soiling yourself.
4. If, God forbid, you do vomit on your shirt, try and arrange the regurgitants in a pattern pleasing to the eye.
5. Don't try to cover your mouth. This only induces projectile vomiting.
6. For you wild types out there, puking into a beer glass is not cool.

7. Like your mother told you, chew your food well so as to avoid chunky bits.

8. Never eat pizza if you plan to vomit, as the cheese may get caught in your throat and you'll have to pull it out manually. Actually, spaghetti isn't such a hot idea either.

Of course, you could avoid all this by simply avoiding the impulse to drink yourself into an incoherent stupor, but why would you want to do that? □

Man-hunting at Carleton: some helpful hints

by Naomi Bock
Queen of the Scene

So you've arrived here at Carleton, the young, vibrant, rarin'-to-go female frosh that you are, and it's time to find out if university men are really more mature than high-school guys.

Well, I don't want to be the one to kill your naive optimism, so you'll have to find out on your own.

Regardless, before you venture out into that testosterone jungle, here are a few friendly tips on the fine art of picking up men.

1. You might want to ditch your "Men Are Scum" T-shirt. Just a thought.
2. As with any art, research is a must.

You must know your prey. Carleton President Robin Farquhar's little-known book Secrets of the Male Mind is a definite must-read.

3. Subtlety, subtlety, my dear.

Table dancing at Oliver's to "I Need a Man" may be a good way to draw attention, but all that will land you is a BURP (Big Ugly Rude Pig). Likewise, Madonnasque beer-cup breast cones may be a tad too much.

4. Retain that sense of mystery.

Revealing your hidden talent for drinking beer through your nose — even if it is with straws — may be a bit much for that first encounter.

5. Be careful not to scare him away.

The human male startles easily. Confiding in him about your dream of that perfect little villa on the Rideau River with the charming picket fence may reveal in him that common condition known as Male Fear of Commitment.

6. Don't play too hard to get.

Males are not only easily startled, they are also easily confused. If you run and hide in the bathroom every time he looks your way, he may take that as a sign of disinterest.

7. Suggest new and exciting things to do.

Imagination is the key, but stay within reasonable limits. Skinny dipping in the canal or taking a parachute love jump off Dunton Tower may have unforeseen negative consequences.

8. Understand the male ego.

Tell him his earlobes are really groovy.

9. Cheesy but clever pick-up lines do work on them.

Whereas we would roll our eyes and say something beautifully cruel, they tend to eat this stuff up.

But beware, come-on lines can backfire badly. "How's it hangin', hot stuff?" has been known to be answered with "A little to the left, but how 'bout you finding out for yourself, sweet mama" and a big cheesy grin that will give you nightmares for months. □

Q: How can I help make my campus a safer place?

A: By Volunteering for the Foot Patrol!

We need women and men to volunteer. We only need you to work 5 hours per month. It's a great way to meet people!

Applications are now available at:
Foot Patrol Office (461 Unicentre), CUSA Office (401 Unicentre)
R.R.R.A. Office (Res Commons), Volunteer Bureau (128 Unicentre)
Women's Centre (308 Unicentre)

Applications are due at 4 pm, September 15, 1993. Interviews will be held September 16, 17, 20, 21. Any Questions? Call the Foot Patrol office at 788-4066 for more information.

A non-sexist guide to picking-up the babes

by David Hodges
Love Machine

The art of babe hunting has often been compared to meeting God. While the road to true absolution may be a long, narrow, twisting path, filled with angst and some real scary shit, the final destination is worth the harrowing journey.

The same can be said for scoring with the babes. The peril men and women face when trying to score with babes is just part of the territory, for with great adversity comes great reward.

While there are no guarantees with babe hunting, here are some basic rules to lighten your load on the road to babe heaven:

Today's women are a special breed. They are no longer easily pleased with simple trinkets or bon-bons. At a time when drugs, sex and politics are out, the pick-up line is more important than ever.

Traditional pick-up lines such as, "Hey baby," just don't have what it takes anymore. In previous decades, conventional lines like this were considered to be simple and effective. Like a pair of faded jeans, they felt oh-so-right. But times have changed and so has the pick-up line.

Today's generation has a much funkier, get-down-with-it-bro' kind of attitude. So, here are three pick-up lines which reflect this hipper style.

1) "Come O" — This pick-up line is commonly referred to as the alternative approach. At its most basic level, it is a throwback to the traditional "Hey Baby." It combines the abrasive, straightforward nature of the original with a fresh, delicious, youthful zing.

In essence, it is an intermingling of both new and old. It's a modern term which harkens back to the past. Sort of like those new/old plastic Coke bottles.

2) "Nice Skin" — Complimenting women isn't always easy. When offering a compliment, one runs the risk of offending the woman in question. No one likes to be referred to as a piece of meat (except maybe men). Because of the long history of men's lewd gestures towards women, one must be very sensitive about this issue.

In recent years this controversy has been fuelled by Malcolm-Jamal Warner of Cosby Show fame. In his role as Theo, he on several occasions referred to attractive women as burgers. Truly disgusting.

Most people constantly overlook the obvious. We all have skin, so why not compliment women on that? By calling attention to a woman's clear and beautiful complexion, she will be dazzled and left in awe of your greatness.

3) "How Much?" — If all else has failed, try humor. This approach really tests the waters by showing your prospective companion your zany sense of wit. Even if it doesn't work, you've at least been mildly entertained by getting a cheap laugh at someone else's expense. However, I have yet to meet a woman who was not charmed by this particular pick-up line.

There you have it — three sure-fire pick-up lines designed to work for anybody. You may not be a perfect physical specimen. Maybe your personality is less than adequate. It doesn't matter. If you have a pulse, there is no reason why my methods will not work for you. □

Sandbox standoff

Maybe now the summer's over and it's back-to-school for the CUSA kiddies, they won't have time to muck around with each other in the sandbox anymore.

But it's doubtful.

It has been a summer of rumors, huddles, closed lips and finger-pointing in the standoff between some service co-ordinators and their supervisors on the executive of the Carleton University Students' Association.

The struggle peaked in Toronto the last week of August, when both sides appeared before the Ontario Labor Relations Board. The board will determine if service co-ordinators Wayne Ross and Renée Twaddle were unjustly fired by CUSA for attempting to unionize CUSA employees and if all CUSA employees should be automatically certified as a bargaining unit.

That's the easy part. The rest of the story just doesn't add up — yet.

Service co-ordinators Ross and Twaddle were fired. They say it was because they were organizing a union drive. CUSA says it was because there was "just cause." Some accusatory letters have been sent back and forth between both sides. Three service offices and the CUSA office were illegally entered and some office's files were tampered with. Office locks were changed. The Unicentre halls are rife with rumours. Peoples' tales on both sides change with the wind.

Perhaps not enough students have been around this summer to remind people who they're really here to serve.

Example: the CUSA executive and some service co-ordinators spent the better part of the last CUSA council meeting Aug. 11 lobbing accusations and sarcastic remarks at one another. Council went into two closed sessions to talk in private about the labor dispute.

Then council hurriedly debated CUSA's entire yearly $2-million operating budget for just over an hour before the meeting ended at 11:30 p.m.

Personal politics may be a lot more sexy than a boring old budget, but that money — students' money — makes CUSA and its services go 'round.

Watson has refused to state publicly why Ross and Twaddle were fired, but is adamant that she has "just cause" for firing them. So what is it? The executive must be publicly accountable for all its actions. Otherwise, they can just hire and fire willy-nilly.

Furthermore, it was clear from the Aug. 11 council meeting that councillors weren't consulted before any of these decisions to fire co-ordinators were made. Some councillors weren't even aware there was a union drive being organized.

Judging from the past couple of meetings, councillors are there only to serve as rubber stamps for whatever budget the executive has decided to pass.

We'd also like to know how services can be running at full capacity and be ready to deal with the fall rush of students when co-ordinators are busy testifying at hearings, meeting behind closed doors and, according to at least one co-ordinator, holding union-organizing meetings during their office hours.

Members of the CUSA executive aren't immune from long meetings and closed-door sessions either. In fact, going in-camera has become a regular part of council meetings these days. Let's hear it for openness and accountability.

A union drive isn't the issue here. What's important is the atmosphere of suspicion and mistrust which has taken over the Unicentre. It makes you wonder how any work got done this summer. It makes you question if any will get done in the fall when it really counts.

We're about to find out. MG & KJ

OPINION

Summertime blues at Carleton

by Doron Aronson

Doron Aronson is a fourth-year political science and urban studies student at Carleton.

The long, hot Ottawa summer was one in which some undergraduate students in political science at Carleton suffered through inefficient and poorly managed courses.

My experiences made me wonder if the university sees its summer courses as cash cows, existing only to make money for the university with quality education as a secondary priority.

I took two second-year sociology courses this summer. I found those courses to be adequate in that I learned new things, even though there were no teaching assistants.

I also took a second-year political science course involving computer-oriented research which required a lot of tutorial assistance.

That assistance was lacking. The classes were scheduled for three hours and rarely lasted more than an hour and 45 minutes. The professor was rarely available for help outside class. He even said he dealt primarily with graduate students and had no office hours to help undergraduate students.

I went to speak to the undergraduate supervisor for political science three weeks into the course to ask why our course in quantitative political science research methods had not given out the name of the teaching assistant.

Until then, most students thought we didn't have one. That night, the professor revealed the name of the teaching assistant, who was only there to mark assignments and exams. The teaching assistant held office hours, but only for two weeks because he said he wasn't getting paid to hold them.

When I spoke to the undergraduate supervisor he was cordial, but quite sarcastic with some of his remarks. He said, "Don't blame our department, blame Bob Rae!" What type of patronizing response is that?

I was extremely disturbed to hear a professor in such a position of responsibility tell me to put the blame on the premier of the province. I expected a little less cynicism and a little more acceptance of responsibility. In my opinion, the first step in fixing a problem is to realize you have one.

And Carleton does. The problem is not so much the teaching itself. The problem has to do with the university's willingness to provide enough time and money to make summer courses worth taking.

Just as any service in the common market involves an exchange of equal funds for an equal receipt of service, this should be the case when it comes to courses. Carleton's only commodity to sell is its courses and summer students aren't receiving equal educational value compared to fall and winter courses.

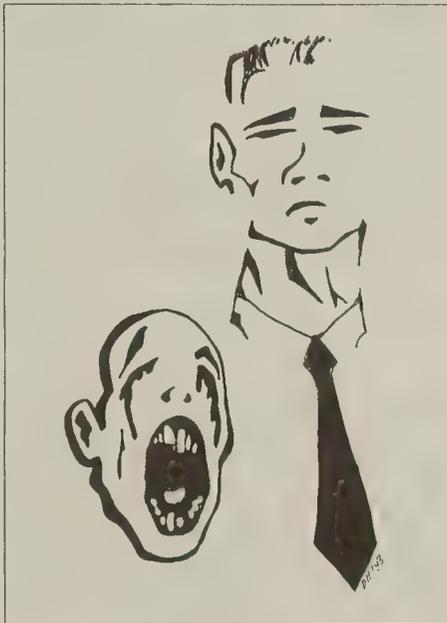

The political science department at Carleton University blames the administration. The teaching assistants blame the political science department for not allocating their budget so as to accommodate summer courses. When approaching administration, I was sent back to the political science department for help.

So, once again the bitter irony in all this is that everyone's policy at Carleton University is to transfer responsibility to other departments rather than dealing with it themselves.

Administration, the political science department and the teaching assistants have created one insensitive vicious circle in which nobody seems to care for anyone else. Revenue-generation, profit and passing off responsibility are more important priorities than students' education.

It appears that Carleton considers summer education a part-time task done exclusively for the income. But students should be receiving the same education for their money in the summer as they get during the rest of the year

Shots from the grassy knoll

Editor:

Re: "Baa baa councillors, have you any spine," The Charlatan, June 24, 1993.

Oliver Stone and the conspiracy theorists are correct.

You're absolutely right, that is "what happens when you let someone become council chair who, as the vice-president internal, wanted to abolish CUSA council two years ago."

In fact, "quickly" adjourning council when we were "just a few councillors" short of quorum was, and still is, all part of the plan to continue my crusade of abolishing council.

But that's not all — being hired as CUSA chair by the same person I hired for the same position, those same two years ago, was also part of the plan; my continued presence on campus, despite having been awarded a bachelor of arts degree 12 months ago, is also part of the plan; and my relationship, in 1992, with a then Charlatan cub-reporter, who has since risen to the esteemed position of news editor, was also part of the plan.

Thanks, Karin, for restoring to the prestigious Charlatan editorial column the cause of my long struggle. As a result of your factual, well-written, well-argued, well-researched, well-intentioned and positively insightful editorial which made the same point editors have been making since way back in the late-sixties (see "Don't rock the boat," The Carleton, Sept.

30, 1966), my cause has once again been brought to the forefront of student debate on campus. This, too, has all been part of the plan.

Long live the revolution.

More Touchtone frustration

Editor:

I consider it my obligation as a Carleton University student to point out the shortcomings of the computerized registration system so that it may be rectified for better service to all students and reduce the administrative cost and frustrations endured by students, professors, department secretaries and the university.

The system permits pre-determined groups of students to register at consecutive periods. However, there is no provision in the system to distribute the available seats in a course equally among these groups. Students who are scheduled to register at a later time are usually unable to find available seats in courses of high demand.

I was informed that there is a procedure in place to give all students equal opportunity. However, from my experience and from the experiences of other students I have spoken with, the procedure has little or no success in achieving its goal. Although I have no expertise to suggest ways to rectify the system, there are more than a few possibilities: a) allocate/reserve the available seats in equal amounts for all groups; b) allow all students of a particular year to register at the same time; c) find a more effective procedure (better randomization) of forming groups such that all students get a chance to register early at some point.

I and many other students would appreciate some initiative in resolving this situation.

The head of security told me the sign committee has not authorized funds for security signs, yet the university just put up new signs prior to the Learned's Conference. Why was security information not included on the new signs? Why are there no outdoor pay phones, emergency phones or alarms? I rode all over campus at 1:30 a.m. to see whether I could find anything that would connect or direct me to security. I found nothing and I did not see any security vehicles or security people.

Outside and insecure

Editor:

Although Carleton University has improved safety inside the tunnels and buildings, there are no security resources outside of the Carleton campus buildings. There are no pay phones, no emergency phones, no signs saying where security is and no signs with the emergency security number. I was stunned by these observations.

If someone is attacked or injured outside a campus building they must first find an open building (not all buildings and doors are open at night), find a phone and then find the number for security. The security number is very difficult to find in the phone book since their department changed names and the emergency number (788-4444) is not listed in the white pages.

The Charlatan gladly accepts all letters and opinion pieces. Deadline for letters is Monday at 5 p.m. Writers should include their name, faculty, year and phone number. Letter without phone numbers or signatures will not be published. Phone numbers are for verification and will not be published. Silver lining found in hard work

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

From May until August, third-year Carleton students Suzanne Bird and Krista Wilson were going to Toronto every weekend.

To train.

As promising members of the Carleton field hockey team, the two women attended the Ontario field hockey club's weekly training and tryout sessions hoping for a chance to represent the province at the Canada Games.

Held every four years, the Games are a showcase and springboard for about 3,800 athletes who have never competed on a national level for Canada.

In the end, the lost weekends were worth it.

Bird, a midfielder, and Wilson, a forward, made the Ontario team and captured silver at this year's Games in Kamloops, B.C., from Aug. 8 to Aug. 21.

Also participating was second-year Carleton link Vicki Wilcox, a member of the New Brunswick squad.

"I'll never forget it," says Bird, recalling the experience. "The stands were full. The feeling of pride you get when the play stops and people start cheering was incredible. I had fans coming up to me afterwards shaking my hand, wishing me well, even asking me for my autograph. It was just the best time."

Wilcox agrees.

"It was an unforgettable experience because the competition and calibre of play was so high," she says. "I've never been in a competition where an entire week was spent with people who talked about field hockey. There was this excitement in the air that just made you feel good about the sport you were playing."

In round robin play, Ontario finished first in their pool while New Brunswick placed second in their division. That set up an Ontario-New Brunswick semi-final showdown which Ontario won 2-0.

In the finals, Ontario finished second, losing gold to the B.C. team 1-0. The New Brunswick squad lost the bronze medal match 2-0 to Calgary.

Winning silver was satisfying, says Bird, but more important was the passion she rediscovered for the sport.

"We had to train in 40 degree weather down in Toronto," she says. "That really tested us and made us push and train harder just to get to go to the Games. And then the experience of having played in the Games really rekindled our love for the game."

That experience also bodes well for the upcoming field hockey season.

"You have to look at it from a time point of view," says field hockey coach Suzanne Nicholson. "Those two months preparing for (the Canada Games) is like two years of training and coaching at Carleton. It accelerates their development. It also lifts our program up a notch. Most other schools have national and provincial team members on their squads. Carleton's now beginning to join that upper echelon."

Last year, the field hockey team finished eighth out of 10 teams in the Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletic Association with a 3-6-4 record.

However, they also reached the playoffs for the first time since 1989 and improved to 10 points from their total of five the year before.

The Bird-to-Wilson duo was instrumental last year and should click as a unit even more this year.

"We've seen how much more we can do together just from playing together all summer," says Wilson. "It'll be great to see what we can accomplish if we play just as hard during the school year."

Their goal as unofficial team leaders this year is to lead by example.

"You can only play your way," says Wilcox. "I don't think we can elevate the team's play by ourselves. We can only come out with the energy, concentration and focus to play at a high intensity and hope our teammates will see that and subconsciously start playing that way too. If we go about our game in our own quiet little way, maybe they'll follow." □

Bootcamp begins for football Ravens

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

The 1993 Ontario-Quebec Interuniversity Football Conference season kicked off Aug. 20 without a touchdown, without a victory and without a loss.

Instead the Carleton Ravens and their cross-town rivals, the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees, opened punishing two-week training camps full of team meetings, equipment fittings, practice drills and gruelling two-a-day practices.

The Gee-Gees are hoping to improve on last year's 3-4 record, while the Ravens are looking to post a victory in the win column after an 0-7 campaign last fall.

Defensive linemen practise blocking techniques during a training session.

Raven coach Donn Smith invited approximately 120 players to camp and has stated publicly that every job is open on the Raven roster.

"If anybody's coming here thinking they have their position locked up, they're in for a very rude awakening come training camp," said Smith, "because I'm looking for people who have the ability to turn a page on what's been going on here and understand that there's a new regime and a new opportunity."

Halfway through camp, about 75 athletes remain. Some have dropped out and some have been asked to leave.

Also attending the camp is Rob Dunn, the Raven player who spent nine days in hospital with a broken jaw and severe concussion after taking a vicious, illegal hit in last year's Panda Game.

Dunn and the Ravens travelled to Cornwall to scrimmage with the national champion Queen's Golden Gaels this past Saturday, Aug. 28, with positive results, Smith said.

"Our objective here was to be competitive and get in as many players as we could for the purposes of evaluation," said Smith. "We achieved both those objectives."

The Ravens' next goal is a pre-season win against the University of Guelph Gryphons on Sept. 4. □

Athletics responds to Pedro's Panda Game Prayer

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

Dear Carleton Athletics, I'm just a small stuffed bear. I don't know much about politics, money or sex.

In fact, I don't even know anything about football.

But I do know that the Panda Game in my honor -- a tradition between the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees and the Carleton Ravens for 38 years -- was in jeopardy earlier this month because of financial and scheduling problems surrounding the two available weekend dates.

Boy, was I ever worried. In fact, I was almost too upset to eat my bamboo shoots. I was told the Sept. 18 meeting between the Gee-Gees and Ravens in Frank Clair stadium was unacceptable as the Panda date because it would conflict with the Home Show at Lansdowne Park.

Bummer.

The Gee-Gee horse-thingy then told me that holding the game on Oct. 23 would result in a $7,500 overtime clean-up bill to the two universities because of a Riders CFL game in the stadium the night before.

Bigger bummer.

I understand both universities lost money on the past two Panda Games, including deficits of about $4,000 each in last year's match, which the Gee-Gees won 17-6.

When I think of how expensive bamboo shoots are these days, even my little brain could understand your financial worries.

But even though I'm just a silly little bear and not very bright, I still didn't understand why this would put my special game in peril. Couldn't we have it on another day? Couldn't we have it at Raven field instead? Couldn't we ante up the overtime money and have it at Frank Clair stadium? Couldn't we . . . ?

Oh, my head hurts from all this thinking.

After hearing about all these awful no-game scenarios, I was relieved to find out there were meetings last week among representatives of the city, the stadium, the Rough Riders and the universities.

Seems everyone was in agreement that my big day was pretty important and that it would be a travesty to let it die a slow and lingering death.

That was good to hear.

Then, just this past weekend I found out that a decision was reached -- the city and the two universities would split the $7,500 clean-up bill, raise ticket prices by a dollar and have the game at Frank Clair stadium on Sunday, Oct. 24.

Boy, was I relieved.

I know I'm just a small stuffed bear whose opinion really doesn't matter in the big scheme of things, but I really am glad my big game didn't get lost in administrative red tape. I'm glad things have been resolved and finalized.

Thank you.

Sincerely,
Pedro the Panda. □

Positive sell nets recruitment results

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

About twice a week during the year, women's volleyball coach Peter Biasone sits down at his desk and starts making phone calls.

He refers to it as making contact. Other coaches call it recruitment. And it's probably the most important element of a varsity team's success.

"I'd say it amounts to between 65 and 75 per cent in determining how well your team does," says Biasone.

At Carleton and other universities across the country, recruiting athletes is becoming an increasingly important aspect of a coach's job.

"If you don't recruit, I don't know how you can survive," says women's soccer coach Dave Kent. "Because if I don't go out and recruit and entice and offer to the students what we have, who's going to play for me?"

Although it's as old as the hills, recruitment is now experiencing a revival of sorts as talent-starved universities fight for a finite pool of gifted recruits. In Ontario, 17 universities compete for graduating athletes each and every year.

"It's getting more competitive all the time," says Biasone. "And getting an edge on other schools is difficult because we're all bound by the same rules."

While there are a myriad of recruiting guidelines, these complex regulations basically boil down to simple rules governing the conduct of universities in their approach to prospective athletes.

Universities are restricted from enticing athletes with money, gifts, guaranteed roster spots, or anything else.

Schools are also supposed to refrain from trashing other universities. The right to extol the virtues of their own facilities and programs is the only recruiting tool schools are permitted.

And that one weapon, many Carleton coaches agree, is the key to successful recruiting.

"The first thing you have to do is sell the school," says Biasone. "If I can influence a student to come to Carleton and study science, then I've done well. The volleyball aspect is a selling point, sure, but the school has to come first."

On the phone, Biasone follows a set pattern. First an introduction. Then a series of questions — do you want to play volleyball at a university level? What programs are you interested in? Other questions follow. That call is followed by an information package and likely another phone call.

"You have to get out there and make as many contacts as you can," he says. "You have to talk to coaches, talk to athletes, go to tournaments and see as many of these kids as possible. Then you have to give them as much information as you can about Carleton and sell the school on them."

The scenario is similar among other coaches.

"I call the coach first and ask the coach to pass on my interest to the student," says Kent. "If the player is interested, I'll send them a Raven kit, invite her to see one of our games, meet with the student, her parents and talk to them about Carleton. That's my strategy."

For Carleton athlete Kathy Keegan, the approach worked.

"They (the coaching staff) just did a nice job of selling Carleton," says the third-year Carleton student and soccer midfielder from Sudbury. "My priority is school, and when Dave (Kent) came up to see me play, he impressed me. The attention was important. How can you not like that? Then he brought me down to Ottawa, showed me the campus, the field, the uniforms, everything."

That personal attention is important. "Everyone knows that if a coach butters you up it helps," she says. "A coach that calls you up, 'ho hum, thank you very much,' that's not going to get me excited."

Building that rapport is also key to women's basketball coach Marg Jones.

"It's a three- to four-year process," she says, commenting on her recruitment philosophy. "It's not something that can be done in six months."

"You have to be involved with them. You have to know the athletes for a couple of years through training camps and contact. That's the approach (to recruitment) that's worked."

For the most part, schools operate within the rules of promoting their own programs and facilities.

But not always. At the University of Manitoba last year, the school's athletic director and football coach were fired after it was discovered they were illegally awarding athletic scholarships to incoming recruits.

Even within the rules, methods vary. "Some coaches can be pretty underhanded and establish a relationship over a short period of time without spending time with athletes," says Jones. But I think it's pretty tacky and cheesy if you become a person's best friend just in their Grade 13 year."

Although such recruiting practices do exist, they're frowned upon by most.

"Most coach's are pretty upfront and honest," says Biasone.

"You don't get very far by defrauding students."

"The coaches who do their homework and put in the time on recruiting honestly with the students' best interests at heart are usually the one's with successful teams." □

Sweltering heat, bad sound mar show

Pearl Jam and Doughboys
August 17
Robert Guertin Arena

sea of long-haired, Doc-Martened teens suffered the suffocating heat of this Hull arena to witness the coming of Seattle's gurus of grunge, Pearl Jam.

True to grunge style, the stage setup was kept to a minimum: basic black with a spotlight in the shape of a barrel of a gun in the background.

Montreal's Doughboys opened the show. Recently signed to A&M and touring to support their fourth full-length release Crush, they managed to drum up quite a frenzy.

They played 11 songs, both old and new. Then the audience ate it all up and was surprisingly familiar with their songs.

On the fashion front, Pearl Jam frontman Eddie Vedder, whose video and concert appearances suggest he owns only two sets of clothes, was predictably decked out in the brown and khaki outfit he wore in their video for "Jeremy." His other set of clothes, a plaid uniform, was probably still dirty from last year's Lollapalooza gigs.

Audience reaction to their set was mixed as Pearl Jam chose the Hull audience to test out some new material. If the concert was any indication, watch for the band's next release to be a radical departure from their previous material.

Faced with unfamiliar songs, the crowd didn't get into the show as much. There was less bouncing around and nobody sang along (of course).

However, the band didn't disappoint fans who wanted to hear the hits. They played "Even Flow" and "Alive," from the epic debut release Ten.

Their 20-minute encore was highlighted by "State of Love and Trust" from the soundtrack to the movie

ANNA BRZOZOWSKI

And now I'll make a bunny!

Singles and a cover of the Who's "Baba O'Riley."

By the end of the show, the arena was so hot that T-shirts were shed and the place became a sea of bare male backs.

The biggest downfall (apart from the sweltering heat) was the arena's poor sound quality. It was almost impossible to understand anything said by the band members between songs.

The sound was so bad that when Vedder held up a water bottle in one hand and a wine bottle in the other to make some kind of deep philosophical statement, nobody had a clue what he was going on about.

The crowd was well-controlled. The mosh pit wasn't dangerous and there was only one measly attempt at stage diving. There was, however, an abundance of crowd surfers.

Vedder, who is known for climbing his stage sets (as he did at Lollapalooza 1992), took a more subdued approach and remained in one spot most of the time.

In retrospect, the heat, the sound and the unfamiliar material made the sold-out concert less than the event it should have been. □

General Idea: good concept bad execution

Videotapes by General Idea
National Gallery of Canada

by Blayne Haggart
Charlatan Staff

First, let's give credit where credit is due: any piece of art that involves painting with poodles merits special attention.

The painting with poodles idea is typical of General Idea's videos. They have plenty of good ideas and promise, but they're very inconsistent.

General Idea is a Toronto-based artistic collective. Formed in 1968 by A.A. Bronson, Felix Partez and Jorge Zontal, their goal as performance artists is to take over the structures of popular culture — for instance, television or magazines — and inject the "germ of art discourse." This is accomplished by parodying the media they inhabit.

From this point of view, they can be most easily compared with Monty Python. Both groups took their medium (television) and parodied it.

Monty Python mimicked stupid broadcasters and rarely ended their sketch with a clean punch line. General Idea paints with poodles and talks about products like "Nazi Milk."

On view at the National Gallery are seven General Idea videos as well as a few copies of their File magazine. A take off on Life magazine, it celebrates nostalgia in reverse and is generally silly.

A gallery is probably not the best place to see General Idea's work. Television is for watching in your living room, not in a bare room in a gallery. Perhaps if they'd done the room up...

From the television, General Idea lay out their manifesto in their 28-minute television program, "Test Tube."

"Test Tube" is set at the Color Bar, (with a test pattern background — geddit?) where the three artists mix revolutionary cocktails and muse about the nature of TV.

Interspersed with these comments are parodies of commercials and a soap opera-ish bit about an artist having a crisis of conscience. with a scene from the 1960s' Batman television show where the Joker wins a

Nazi milk: for intolerant racists everywhere.

Overall, this sounds like a worthwhile clip. It has a sensible critique (that TV needs some artistic sensibility to get rid of its banality), an interesting format and some comedy.

In parts, it does well. The commercials (especially the Nazi Milk one) come off well and the soap opera part is strange enough to be amusing.

What kills these ideas is the execution. Even though this is "art," it must be judged on the same criteria that we use to judge other television programs. The acting is not very good and the scenes don't really flow. As a parody, it doesn't fly.

It comes across as a bit stilted, as if it was made for broadcast in a gallery and not for broadcast on Dutch TV, which it was.

Another of the seven clips, "Shut the Fuck Up" has the same problems. It starts off painting contest with a completely blank canvas. Of course, all the judges pounce on it as a marvellous work of art.

Throughout the rest of the clip, they poke fun at different art mediums, pointing out the absurdity of some of them. Of course, there's the painting with stuffed poodles that mimics a piece of performance art called "XXX Blue," in which an artist covers several young women in blue paint to make a unique canvas.

They also parody beauty contests with a great piece called "Mondo Cane" where the artists dress up as poodles and dance like ballerinas, all vying for the honor of being Miss General Idea. The live poodle, covered with blue paint and standing on the podium, is a nice touch.

In all though, it's just too little. All these ideas sound like old Monty Python sketches. Because the acting was better and the sketches funnier, Python probably did a better job at subverting and parodying television.

Good acting and good television are essential to getting ideas like General Idea's across. Only when the acting and stories are entertaining will General Idea's parody reach those of us for whom television is used more for entertainment than for education. □

Patronizing boomers screw up again

13th Gen: Abort, Retry, Ignore, Fail?

Neil Howe and Bill Strauss
Random House
229 pages
$12.50

I've seen the best minds of my generation reduced to Kraft Dinner and fast sound bytes by Baby Boomers who like to pontificate about people in their 20s.

But 13th Gen: Abort, Retry, Ignore, Fail?, the latest schlock written by Boomers, is just about as much as I can swallow.

Not because I'm 22 with an attitude, not because I have an aversion to thought or the printed word, not because I hate Boomers or I'm too hard to care, as authors Neil Howe and Bill Strauss might have you believe.

The book, which sets out to document the plight of Generation X—or whatever else they're calling us this week—is rife with gross generalizations, overdone stereotypes and "I'm-so-with-it" lingo which tries much too hard.

Putting up with these guys trying to sound like Douglas Coupland is like watching your Dad trying to talk like Wayne or Garth—goofy and painfully embarrassing for the poor old guys.

The difference between this and Coupland's Generation X besides the authors' ages? Coupland's first book related something new about this generation's situation in a way which had seldom been done before, while 13th Gen is a fired rehash of easy truisms.

After the success of Generation X, Boomers caught a whiff of its best-selling potential and turned it into a formula of their own, spawning shows like Melrose

"BUY A SECOND BEEMER? I CAN'T EVEN RENT OUT MY VACATION CONDO HEY. IS IT ME OR IS THERE SOMETHING WRONG WITH THE SERVICE HERE?"

Place or movies like Singles. When will this become old news?

Howe and Strauss begin the book by "loading" their text onto a computer bulletin board, in case boring old books aren't sexy enough for you. A 23-year-old crasher (author Ian Williams) interrupts the text in sidebars with predictable snarky reactions like, "Don't you know that categorizing and defining stuff you have no clue about is one of the fatal flaws of being a Baby Boomer?"

That didn't stop them, though. Reviving the tiresome old name—that-generation debate, Howe and Strauss decide on 13 as the unlucky number to describe the 13th generation since American independence.

"More than a name, the number 13 is a gauntlet, a challenge, an obstacle to be overcome," they write. Blech.

The authors divide this supposedly like-minded generation of 11- to 31-year-olds into the older "Atari" wave and the younger "Nintendo" wave. Cute guys, very cute.

They then tell you much of what you know already—older people have it better, it's hard to find a job if you don't work at McDonald's or teach English in Japan, you can't buy a house so you buy CDs instead, you're emotionally disturbed because your parents got divorced, your future is a wasteland, blah, blah, blah.

While they do provide stats related to their musings in nifty USA Today-style sidebars, Howe and Strauss blatantly admit their lack of evidence to the crasher: "You wouldn't be reading this if everything we said came with a long footnote, but all this is relentlessly researched, we promise you."

Give us some credit, puh-leez!

However, unlike other Boomer scribes who gripe about how dumb the young 'uns are today, these guys try to defend "a generation with a PR problem." They argue that older Americans give 13ers a bad rap to "rekindle a sense of national community" in a post-Cold War world.

The authors claim 13ers are used unfairly by their elders as the "caricatured image of our collective woes, the indelible icon of national decline," and "a metaphor for America's late-twentieth-century loss of purpose."

But Howe and Strauss entangle themselves in their own criticism by constructing a different image to suit the purpose of their defence—the 13er as the Noble Savage, a "postmodern hunter and gatherer" who is "damaged—but surviving." Their image doesn't come closer to reality than any other 13er stereotype perpetuated by Boomers.

Waxing romantic about the plight of the 13th generation for a tiresome 229 pages, the authors conclude it will lead America to salvation after an apocalyptic war between the generations.

"We, their elders, will never live to see how their story turns out. They will. The rest of us can only imagine how, when their job's done, they'll look history straight in the eye, give a little smile, and move on."

20-Something, Floundering, and Off the Yuppie Track: A Self-Help Guide to Making It Through Your Twenties

by Steven Gibb
Fawcett Crest

h please. Just what the world needs—another self-help book. Worse yet, this one's aimed at Douglas Coupland's favorite demographic cluster, people under 30.

Steven Gibb, the author, is now studying at Purdue University's graduate school in the United States. While having the advantage over the typical "what-is-with-this-generation?" piece written by cooing Baby Boomer hacks, Gibb still falls into the trap of trying to be all-inclusive when writing about our diffuse generation.

It seems beyond the grasp of those in the mass media—especially in publishing—that our generation, like no other before, is individualistic to an extreme. Any attempt by an author to characterize us, even when using social and cultural sub-groupings, is far too sweeping, resentfully so.

The book suffers from many other flaws, the main one resting with its nature.

Self-help writers are cloyingly indulgent. The reader is never told to smarten up in no uncertain terms. If you relapse, that's okay, you'll bounce back. Here is my advice, but you can wilfully ignore it; your situation may be one of the many exceptions to what I write.

For example, Gibb writes, "(Sex) can be one of the most grandly sensual, replenishing, and beautiful experiences in life. But at the same time sex is frightening because it can make us feel so vulnerable."

Admittedly the world has never had clear-cut divisions, but this repeated negation of advice counters any value it might have had in the first place. It's like saying, "It may rain today, or it might not."

Most annoying about this genre is the "it's-other-peoples'-fault-your-life-isn't-better" motif. "I'm okay, you're okay," as one of the most famous self-help books is titled. The reader is always okay—it's others who are the pinheads.

Most self-help manuals advise people to talk it out, preferably with a therapist. Amazingly, Gibb writes, "Find a good therapist," in his last list of recommendations.

Like too many self-help books, 20-

Something is filled with too many exclamation points ("Sex is fun! Sex is complicated! Sex is profound!"), well-duh obvious statements like "Economic pain can be harsh," and slogans like "Half of the battle in figuring out what you want is figuring out what you don't want."

This book does offer a few shards of worthwhile, tough-headed guidance. Gibb condemns divorce, New Age philosophy and the "Yuppie Icon" of career success and thinness above all else.

Hidden amongst all the dross are two good, solid chapters of useful, unromantic advice: one on job-hunting and the other on how to live off entry-level wages.

Gibb ends the book with a sensible chapter-long discussion of the typical confusion tied to this time of life. He finishes with a recommendation to read William Styron's Darkness Visible, a short memoir on the crippling strength of depression.

Darkness Visible is what more self-help books should be. Styron writes about what he knows—how he survived the tangible pain of depression. A reader gains more listening to someone who has actually been through such a condition than from any self-help book.

Coming to terms with the sperms

An Historical guide to the meaning of sperm

by Dave Hodges and Andrea Smith Spermatologists

hey're all around us, but we can't see them. This might explain why such an important substance as sperm has been relatively overlooked in popular culture. Who are they? Why are they here? Where do they come from?

These tadpoles of love have been navigating scorn, ridicule and misunderstanding throughout the history of the Western world, while being misrepresented and shrouded in myth.

In modern times, the mythology of sperm has been taken over by modern cinema, as Hollywood has turned sperm into fodder for the commercial imagination. But to understand the cinematic portrayal of sperm, it is first necessary to examine the tradition from which these fellows have emerged.

punishes auto-eroticists (masturbators). As the story goes, Onan spilt his seed upon the ground instead of sleeping with his wife and was duly punished by God.

As sperm moved onto the centre stage in Hollywood, they took on a life of their own. Movies add another layer of mythology — this time of more liberated sperm, damaged but surviving.

BECOMING YOUR SPERM

In the late eighties, the movie Look

In Everything You Always Wanted to Know About Sex But Were Afraid to Ask, Woody Allen portrays an angst-ridden sperm.

In this masterpiece, Allen breaks the stereotype of mindless sperm with only one thing their agenda: egg egg egg.

"I'm scared," says the tiny Woody spermatozoa with glasses, as the vessel in which he travels prepares for ejaculation. "What if he's masturbating? I might end up on the ceiling."

"Hey, when you joined the sperm corps you took an oath," says one of Allen's chromosome-toting colleagues, "to fertilize that egg or die trying."

Aside from the obvious implications for spermkind, this is also a brilliant

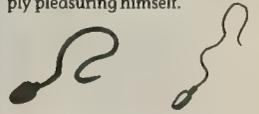

SPERM HATH NO COLOR

The issue of sperm as forerunners of racial acceptance is explored again in Made in America. This is a gripping melodrama which describes the plight of an Afro-American woman played by Whoopi Goldberg who discovers she has been artificially inseminated with the sperm of a cheesy-used-car-sellin', bad-cowboy-suit-wearin' white man, played by none other than Sam Malone himself — Ted Danson.

"You know," says Danson's character at one point, "sperm are funny."

While apparently not quite funny enough to carry an entire movie, the sperm in Made In America are little political lobbyists who deliver the message, "Hey, it doesn't matter if you're black or white, 'cause we all look the same."

The movie also subtly breaks an age-old stereotype that dictates that men must be ashamed of masturbating. In a glorious scene, "Fresh Prince" Will Smith smiles with delight after caressing and stroking his unit. We see for the first time a depiction of a man who will not be chastised or ridiculed by the menacing constructs of society for simply pleasuring himself.

SPERM ARE GOOD, BUT NOT THAT GOOD

Monty Python rebel against the Biblical notion of sperm in their brilliant satire: The Meaning of Life. In the film, they satirize this notion in a skit depicting a Catholic woman constantly doing laundry, in a house overrun with children, who no longer notices when she gives birth.

The hundred or so of her children then break into song:

"Every sperm is sacred, every sperm is great,

If a sperm is wasted, God gets quite irate.

Let the heathen spill theirs
On the dusty ground,
God will make them pay for each sperm that can't be found."

After millennia of use and abuse by theologians, philosophers and movie producers, it's time for sperm to be recognized for what they are: the indispensable worker bees of reproduction. There's been enough mythology and misinformation. It's time we shut up and let the little critters do their job. □

THE HISTORY OF SPERM

Sperm are not just the foot soldiers of procreation — they're little messengers carrying our political and historical baggage.

The Greeks, like Hippocrates and Aristotle, had some peculiar beliefs about semen. In his treatise The Seed, Hippocrates wrote that semen was the "the foamy substance of the blood," resulting from the "intertwining of bodies." Heated by the "natural warmth of the male," a froth would form in the blood, spreading through the "spermatoc veins."

Aristotle believed semen was precious to the body as a material for growth. He thought the discharge of semen could take away essential nutrients that might have gone to all parts of the body. Sperm, therefore, were not to be wasted.

The Book of Leviticus in the Old Testament reads, "When any man has a discharge from his penis, the discharge is unclean." For that matter, any discharge of the nasty stuff made a man "unclean in the eyes of the Lord."

Leviticus goes on to say if a man ejaculates (no matter why or how) he should bathe his whole body. Even doing so, he remained unclean until evening. Anyone unfortunate enough to come into contact with the masturbator was also required to bathe.

Despite the unclean nature of these emissions, the Judeo-Christian tradition also teaches the wickedness of wasted seed.

In the Lost Books of Eden, apocryphal texts not included in the Hebrew Bible, the story of Onan tells how the good Lord Who's Talking featured Bruce Willis as the voice of the one lucky sperm to fertilize Kirstie Alley's ovum. With child-like innocence and a brooding intensity, he throws away millennia of historical stigma portraying an exuberant, strong, proud spermatozoa before he takes on the role of the baby.

Willis conveys a powerful message to the audience, affirming the bittersweet bond between a man and his semen — he tells us we should celebrate these little swimmers in the race for life and exalt in the wonder of procreation.

In his stunning narration, Willis delves into himself, embracing his spermness.

metaphor for the Vietnam conflict.

In another clever scene, Allen deals with racial prejudice.

"Hey! What am I doing here?" asks a black sperm awash in a sea of white sperm.

Regardless of his confusion, he is accepted by his fellow sperm. Skin color is simply not an issue. If sperm can get together despite having different colored skin, it seems absurd that we, as organisms much more complex than a single sperm, should continue to quibble over racial differences.

Sperm are good. Sperm are good.

Trashcan Sinatras: Intentionally Obscure

by Jane Tattersall
Charlatan Staff

The Trashcan Sinatras could be known as a band that consciously avoids attention. Their dreamy, guitar-laden melodies and cryptic lyrics make them the perfect alternative for those who are tired of the current grunge-metal scene.

With the June release of their second album, I've Seen Everything, the five lads from Irvine, Scotland, should receive a lot more of the spotlight in North America.

So far the album has spawned two singles, the title track and "Hayfever," both of which have made the college charts across Canada and the United States. Plus, their mini-tour of North America this summer was very well-received.

Formed in late 1987 by brothers John and Stephen Douglas, the Trashcans originally started out as a school project.

"We were all in a communications-type class together and got this assignment to do a project," recalls guitarist David Hughes. "We had no idea what to do so we just started banging away on anything we could get our hands on, and Frank (Read) sang over it."

One of the instruments they used was a garbage can. Later, when they were learning to play their instruments, one of the first songs they mastered was an old Sinatra song. Hence their unusual name.

"It was more of a joke, really," protests David. "We were never a Frank Sinatra cover band, but we have been known to cover a few of his songs, especially when we didn't know how to play anything else."

Wow! A relatively clear photo of those obscure Scottish fellows.

After that strange beginning, they were hooked. The Douglas brothers, along with Read and guitarist Paul Livingston set about practising and writing songs. When they hit the road, however, Hughes elected not to go on and was replaced by George McDaid. The band wasted no time in gaining a following and signing with Go! Discs.

Their first album, Cake, was released in 1989, and the single "Obscurity Knocks" was an instant hit in the U.K. Twisted melodies combined with wistful lyrics like, "I like your poetry but I hate your poems," propelled the band onto the British music scene.

After following that single with the well-received "Only the Tongue Can Tell" and the beautiful "January's Little Joke," they disappeared from sight until this year's release. Now they're back, with Hughes replacing the departed McDaid.

The Trashcan Sinatras have always been conscious of their image. They carefully monitor all artwork and designs that go into each release. On Cake, the cover is an abstract oil painting resembling a blurred landscape; the photos in the liner notes are unfocused so none of the band members are identifiable.

This was deliberate, says Livingston. "We wanted to be seen as a band, not to have individuals picked out and spotlighted."

Despite their greatest efforts to stay obscure as individuals, the band managed to make the cute band alert columns in Sassy magazine. The Sassy article raved about their "clear-skinned, crew-cutted Scottish beauty."

At the mention of this, David smiles thinly.

"Yeah, we heard about that." Another factor in the Sinatras' appeal is undoubtedly their live show. Their studio work is relatively passive, with soft, tuneful guitar rhythms layered over Read's mournful voice. Live, however, the tunes become a little rougher, guitars jangle more, and Read becomes the perfect image of tortured anguish.

Evidence of this appeal could be seen at their Toronto date in June. Crowd response to their emotional show was so overwhelming that the band decided to play an unplanned second encore.

Their choice of song? A Frank Sinatra tune, of course, dedicated to Toronto band The Nancy Sinatras.

ARTS INSIGHT

Playing (live) music while the sun still shines...

by Blayne Haggart
Charlatan Staff

Evenings in Ottawa just got a lot earlier.

Zaphod Beeblebrox, the mainstay of live alternative music in Ottawa, now has a new format.

In the past, Zaphod's featured live music starting around 10 p.m. from Thursday to Saturday. Wednesdays and Sundays were the sole domain of the Electric Ballroom, Zaphod's popular cover-free DJ nights.

Now, the Electric Ballroom will run Tuesdays through Sundays. Thankfully, there's still live music Thursday to Saturday, but with earlier starting times. The first band will be on at 8 p.m., the headliner at 9 p.m., with Electric Ballroom to follow. There's a cover charge before 10:30 p.m. except for the nights there are no bands.

According to Eugene Haslam, the man who is Zaphod Beeblebrox, these changes are not the result of any financial difficulties or small crowd turnouts.

"We're not responding to problems. We want to do the best we can do and be the best we can be."

Haslam says he feels this is a very positive move, both for the crowds and for the bands, making the club more user friendly.

The bands will like this change, Haslam says, because the earlier time slot means the "band could still shmooze with the crowd" when their gig is over. This is in contrast to what happened before when, as Haslam points out, a band came out of the dressing room at 1:30 a.m. and nobody was around.

He also sees the change as one that will benefit Zaphod's clientele, especially those who need to hire babysitters or who, like myself, live in the suburbs and usually have to leave a show before it's ended.

Live music at Zaphod's will now be the beginning of an evening instead of its culmination.

"Once you've seen something, you're feeling pretty damn good. You'll want to stick around," Haslam says.

Doubtless this is true for many people in Ottawa who enjoy dancing and listening to recorded music. For those of us out there who would rather check out some live music than drink and dance and check out the crowd, it's not really that positive a change.

Concerts that end at 11 p.m. may mean I can catch that last bus home and save a two-hour walk. It may mean that people who have to work the next day will get a sound sleep.

But it also means that another site in Ottawa rolls up its live-music sidewalks way too early.

The scheduling puts students in a special quandary. Night classes and part-time jobs often run into the early evening. This means you might miss the early live show at Zaphod's.

Of course, if it's your favourite band, you'll skip the class in an instant. To quote Haslam, "If you want to see Pearl Jam, you'll go see Pearl Jam."

However, if it's just a band you've heard plenty about, you'll probably take a miss. I wasn't a big enough Superchunk fan to skip class for an 8 p.m. gig on a Wednesday. As a result I missed what was called one of the best Ottawa concerts in years.

Late one Tuesday evening I did check out the Dharma Bums, whom I'd never heard of before. I had a blast.

People into live music don't just go see bands they're fanatical about. They check out bands they've heard good things about. Sometimes they'll go to a live club because of its reputation, regardless of who's playing.

Zaphod's does deserve credit for diversifying its Electric Ballroom nights, which used to be the same Wednesdays and Sundays. Now, Tuesdays will feature industrial music, Thursdays, hard-edged guitar music, Fridays, world music, and Saturdays, tribal funk and hip hop. But there are already enough places in town playing recorded music, even if it doesn't have that Zaphod's edge.

There are both positive and negative points to this change. Unless Zaphod's becomes a permanent dance club, there's no reason to worry about a shortage of good live music in Ottawa.

For some, perhaps, live music is just part of an evening out. Others, like myself, feel that live music is best heard indoors, in a club, late at night, when the sun is down. This, in essence, is what is being lost here. □

Hey Kids!

It's time to play the big "Come and Grab What's in My Drawer" Contest!

All you have to do is answer a skill-testing question. The first person who comes up to The Charlatan's office (531 Unicentre Building) with the correct answer will receive their choice of a free CD or cassette from the Arts Desk Drawer!

There's loads of stuff to choose from, so hurry on up!

Here's today's skill-testing question:

What is original Cure band member Lol Tolhurst doing with himself these days?

That's it. Get off your butts and come on up to The Charlatan to claim your prize.

Oh yeah, one last thing. Charlatan staff aren't eligible for this contest.

Cheers!

Tasmin Archer great expectations
EMI

Great expectations are exactly what I had for this release after seeing the soulful, unhappy videos for "Sleeping Satellite" and "In Your Care."

Unfortunately, these songs turn out to be unrepresentative of the album as a whole. A good deal of the music is upbeat, happy and overproduced.

However, as far as top-40 pop music goes, great expectations has about 10 times more musical content than the crap that somehow gets to the top of the charts these days. Tasmin Archer's material reminds me of Deborah Holland's music from her days with Animal Logic.

Archer has a powerful and unyielding voice that doesn't seem to realize its full potential. On "Steeltown" and "In Your Care," her vocals are strong and solid but they betray the fact that her voice can do much more. It's almost a let-down.

Other songs, like "Lords of the New Church" have lyrics whose depth is lost in the pop-sounding instrumentation. How can you notice deep lyrics when the music is singing "Happy happy, joy joy?"

The album lends itself well to casual listening, but it is not the melancholic feel-shitty music you might expect. The best tracks are "Sleeping Satellite" and "Halfway to Heaven" which combine good musical production with the somberness of the subject matter.

It's good music if you're in a good mood; if not, you may find it cheerily annoying.

The title Love is Not Sex sucked me in like a guy who once told me the same—the album comes across as being just as slick and rehearsed.

I had my suspicions when I noticed their hair stylist got a credit in the liner notes. They were confirmed by the music — your usual brand of time-to-get-off-the-dance-floor hip hop music and mushy, predictable lyrics like "If there's one thing we need in this world, it's to rain love."

Like the guy, it's not worth your time.

Fishtales Ulysses
Independent

In some places, describing a band as local is the kiss of death. It usually comes across as, "Great, another grunge rehash. Good effort, thanks for showing up."

Ottawa is lucky to have so many talented and diverse bands that describing a band like Fishtales as local no longer has that negative connotation.

With Ulysses, their debut CD release, they've managed to create some fine pop music.

Good pop, as Fishtales demonstrate, has two characteristics. It sounds good (like the opening minute of "So Simple") and it's memorable. A song like "Funny Thing," with its dance beat and Dave Draves' distorted vocals, is a prime example of what a good pop song should be.

Their overall sound is a second cousin to British guitar pop, meaning the guitars are alternately hollow-sounding and light, almost bell-like. Think of early Cure songs without the accompanying two tons of angst and you'll get the idea.

Another world-class effort from a scene bursting with talent.

U2
Zooropa Island

Bowie made this album 16 years ago. U2 have ripped off Low, the first of David Bowie's Eno-influenced trilogy.

Low was Bowie's first collaboration with Brian Eno. As with many previous U2 albums, Eno shares production credit on Zooropa.

Eno's hand in crafting Zooropa is more evident than with any earlier U2 efforts. The music bears all of Eno's hallmarks. It is very soft and ambient, withdrawn, almost taciturn. Synthesizers proliferate.

Continuing with the Low mimicry run-down, "Daddy's Gonna Pay For Your Crashed Car" echoes "Always Crashing the Same Car." Edge's plodding rap on "Numb" echoes the emotional disengagement of "Breaking Glass." U2's "Babyface" is like Bowie's "What in the World." Both these songs are clichéd bubble gum odes asking for the love of a young, vulnerable girl in a cold world.

When Zooropa does not imitate Low, it offers some interesting experiments. It sounds like more of a collective effort than previous U2 albums, with Bono stepping back from front stage and allowing The Edge, Adam Clayton and Eno's music to softly entrance the listener.

"Some Days Are Better Than Others" has U2 sounding almost like The Smiths. And the band saves the best for last, backing Johnny Cash on "The Wanderer." Cash, with his great, grave, gravelly voice narrates, like an old-time preacher, a beautiful, desolate parable of a modern search for the Lord.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 2 TO WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 15

Thursday September 2

Sneezy Waters is playing for free at the National Gallery of Canada Amphitheatre at 12:30 p.m. and 2 p.m. as part of the Cultures Canada festival. He plays a mix of country-folk, blues, rock and zydeco. But the real reason we're going to see him is because we want to see someone named Sneezy.

Tongues and Bones bring their groovin' sounds to Zaphod Beeblebrox tonight with Ohio's The Twist-Offs opening. First band's on at 8 p.m., with Tongues and Bones starting at 9 p.m. Five dollars at the door.

Friday September 3

Like Water for Chocolate is playing at the Bytowne tonight at 9:20 p.m. This fantasy is all about love, food and sex. Tix are $4 for members and $6.50 for everyone else.

Last night to catch Song of Chibi, performed by the Jigsaw Theatre Company, an Ottawa-based multicultural theatre group. It's at 8 p.m. at the U of O's Academic Hall. Tickets are $5 and are available at the Ottawa Women's Bookstore.

Saturday September 4

Fred J. Eaglesmith and the Flying Squirrels continue the Cultures Canada tradition of presenting bands with silly names. Mr. Eaglesmith has been compared to John Mellencamp. 12:30 p.m. and 2 p.m. at the National Gallery Amphitheatre. It's free.

Cancel the dinner plans, forget about heading to Houlihan's. The Age of Faith are playing at Creeque Alley tonight. As cliché as it sounds, these guys rock. A must see.

Sunday September 5

Angstones. 2 p.m., Grand Hall, Canadian Museum of Civilization. $4.50 for Adults. $3 for seniors and youths aged 16 to 21. Cover gets you into the museum as well. Nice hats, boys.

After that, head on down to the Duke of Somerset around 9 p.m. for the Celtic sounds of Jimmy George, the best bar band in Ottawa. Not recommended for claustrophobics.

Monday September 6

The Shuffle Demons close out Cultures Canada (same times, same place as the other bands). If you want to pick up some hints on how to dress, check 'em out.

A Clockwork Orange is playing at 7 p.m. tonight at the Mayfair.

do is give Sloan a hall. Oh, well, that's the U of Zero for you. Tickets are available at Records on Wheels, Record Runner and the U of O Student Federation office.

Thursday September 9

It's double bill night at the Canadian Film Institute, located at the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Hull. At 7 p.m. it's The Lodger, Alfred Hitchcock's first Hitchcockian movie. At 9 p.m. it's Legal Memory, a film about the events surrounding the 1959 execution of Leo Mantha, who was convicted of murdering a young man who was also his lover.

Sloan: "Hey, this doesn't look like the Peppermill."

Tuesday September 7

Stay home. Read a book.

Wednesday September 8

Now that they're on MCA, you'd figure that Halifax's Sloan would be playing the Congress Centre. But you can see them tonight at the University of Ottawa Cafeteria at 7 p.m. for only $7.

Cafeteria? Geez, the least they could

Friday September 10

The Holly Cole Trio plays two shows at the NAC Theatre at 7 p.m. and 9:30 p.m. Tickets are $20 and $24.

San Francisco's Tempest bring their killer Celtic riffs to Zaphod's tonight. They've been described as a Celtic Spinal Tap by B.C.'s Rogue Review. Seven dollars will get you in to this musical extravaganza.

Saturday September 11

What to do, what to do. You have the choice of checking out some punk rock courtesy of Washington, D.C.'s no-sell-out kings Fugazi, with the killer Shudder to Think and Ottawa's Lockjaw. It's at Porter Hall. Tickets are $6 at the usual independent outlets.

Or you can check out the excitement of monster truck races (7:30 p.m. at Lansdowne Park). Tickets are $17.86 for adults and $10.86 for kids between the ages of two and 12.

Truckasaurus! Truckasaurus!

BARBECUE! UNIVERSITY SOCCER FIELD! BEGINNING AT 2 P.M.! COURTESY OF CARLETON'S GRADUATE STUDENTS! FACE PAINTING! LIVE MUSIC! BEER GARDEN!

Sunday September 12

The Nepean Visual Arts Centre is holding an open house. Among the highlights is Children's magician "Roy Cottee." Wow.

If you missed those monster truck races last night, you can see them at 2 p.m. today.

Monday September 13

Buy Crater's new cassette, Kerosene Hat. Listen to it until your ears bleed. Repeat.

Tuesday September 14

The National Ballet of Canada starts a three-day run of The Taming of the Shrew, at 8 p.m. in the NAC Opera. Tickets are $22, $35 and $47.50. If you want to see a ballet, go now. In a few months you won't have this kind of cash to throw around.

Wednesday September 15

Stay at home! Listen to In a Mellow Tone (CKCU 93.1 FM) as Bernard Stepien plays selections from recordings Sonny Rollins made during the eighties.

Non-frosh crash orientation event

by Tonya Zelinsky
Charlatan Staff

Non-frosh students crashed an orientation party at Oliver's bar on Sept. 5, says the co-ordinator of the Carleton Women's Centre.

Renée Twaddle says she received two or three complaints from orientation week facilitators about the crashers' treatment of female frosh students in the bar.

Although the party was an event only for frosh and facilitators, about 15 members of Carleton's football team were let in by Oliver's bar security staff, says René Faucher, finance commissioner for the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA), who attended the party.

Faucher says the team didn't know it was a frosh only event, but he told them they could stay as long as they behaved themselves.

"They were in control of themselves,"

he says.

But Richard Stanton, CUSA's orientation commissioner, says he told his facilitators to keep the frosh as far away from the football players as possible.

Stanton says some facilitators complained to him about the football players because "they were trying to hit on every frosh that came by."

Stanton says he did not remove the football players for fear of a confrontation.

"That would have been suicide, trying to kick out 15 big guys out of a bar at one time. Those guys are a little more forward than the average frosh."

The football coach, Donn Smith, did not want to comment about the incident.

When CUSA President Lucy Watson was asked about the event, she replied that she was "aware of a couple of men who were causing problems on the football team."

In terms of who gets into frosh events, Watson says there are "a few things we have to iron out for next year."

In order to participate in frosh activities, students were required to wear wristbands, which were included in a $50 frosh kit. Faucher says people buying frosh kits were not asked to prove they were in first year.

While the non-frosh students were not asked to leave Oliver's on Sept. 5, an upper-year Carleton student says he was thrown out of Rooster's Coffeehouse during a frosh week event.

Rob Stratham got into Rooster's with a wristband from a frosh kit he purchased. However, as Stratham left to go to the washroom, he says he was stopped by Faucher, who was later joined by Watson and CUSA vice-president internal Rob Jamieson.

Stratham says he was then asked to hand over his wristband and give up his frosh kit. Watson says Stratham was approached to give up his frosh kit earlier in the day, and was presented with his refund, but refused it. She says after making sure he was not a first-year student or a new student to Carleton, the executive decided to pull his frosh kit and reimburse him.

Faucher says while there is no official policy for selling frosh kits, "it's never been a problem." He says Stratham is an isolated example of a person determined to take part in orientation.

"I could pay for a blimp to float over campus saying 'orientation is for frosh' and he'd still want to take part," says Faucher.

Faucher says Stratham was fired as a facilitator last year and wasn't selected this year. □

Board rules CUSA violated labor act

by Brent Dowdall
Charlatan Staff

The Ontario Labor Relations Board has ruled that the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) violated the Ontario Labor Relations Act when it fired two employees in July.

Renée Twaddle, co-ordinator of the Carleton Women's Centre, and Wayne Ross, co-ordinator of the Student Academic Action Bureau, were permanently reinstated to their positions after the board's Sept. 2 decision.

CUSA fired Ross July 15 and Twaddle July 29, giving no reason except "just cause." The board's decision came after a week of hearings held in Toronto in late August.

"We have carefully considered the evidence and submissions of the parties and have concluded that the responding party (CUSA) violated the Labor Relations Act by discharging Renée Twaddle and John Wayne Ross," the board's decision reads.

The decision was made under Section 91 of the Act, which deals with unfair labor practices.

The board also ruled that CUSA must "post for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places in the workplace" a notice to employees which says the association violated the Labor Relations Act.

The notice also says CUSA will not do anything to interfere with any workers' rights set out in the act, such as the right to organize and participate in trade union activities.

CUSA President Lucy Watson says the notices to employees were received Sept. 7 and were posted the morning of Sept. 8. She was away Sept. 7 and the posters had to be signed by her, so they did not go up until Sept. 8.

Watson says the decision of the board was neither a surprise nor an embarrassment to the association.

"We believe everything was done ethically and appropriately. However, that was not the finding of the board and we anticipated that," Watson says.

"I regret the fact that people have not been able to deal with this responsibly and adult-like. I think it's a really serious issue and I think some people have attempted to make it a farce."

CUSA presented no evidence at the board's hearing.

"It's really tempting to give our side of the story," says Watson, "but I don't think it would be responsible of me to start doing that because these people are our employees, and as a responsible employer I don't think it would be a good move to begin criticizing them publicly."

The Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) Local 1281 also applied for automatic certification of all CUSA employees as a bargaining unit under Section 9.2 of the Ontario Labor Relations Act.

Under this section, the board can order the automatic certification of all employees in a workplace if it rules the employer interfered with their attempts to unionize.

The board has not made a decision on that application, and no time has been set for that ruling.

Both Ross and Twaddle refused to comment until the board has ruled on the certification application.

The board denied CUPE's request that CUSA offer Fouad Kanaan his job back. Kanaan resigned from his position as Volunteer Bureau co-ordinator July 29. In his letter of resignation to CUSA director of services Theresa Cowan, Kanaan writes that "I feel that I no longer can work in an atmosphere of such mistrust, fear and conspiracy."

The board also denied CUPE's request that CUSA pay its travel and accommodation costs in travelling to and attending the hearing.

Watson says CUSA won't have their final legal bill for the dispute until the end of the month, but says The Charlatan will be able to see the bill. □

Unicentre may bear Aykroyd's name

by John Steinbachs
Charlatan Staff

CKCU, Carleton's campus radio station, wants the Unicentre to be renamed after the comedian Dan Aykroyd.

Aykroyd was a Carleton student in the 1970s who was involved in CKCU and Sock 'n' Buskin, Carleton's independent theatre group.

The station wants to initiate a student referendum in next month's byelection for the undergraduate students' association to change the Unicentre's name to the Dan Aykroyd Student Centre.

"There may be opposition to this move because he never graduated," says CKCU station manager Max Wallace. "But there's more to university than academics and we think Dan Aykroyd personifies the principle of never letting school interfere with your education."

Aykroyd's father, Peter, says he likes the idea of naming Carleton's student building after his son. "It's a marvellous honor to be given to Dan."

Susan, Aykroyd's mother, says "it's an honor and recognition of Dan's work and acceptance" at Carleton.

But Aykroyd's uncle, Maurice Aykroyd, isn't sure how his nephew will feel about the referendum.

"He never finished university, and he's not too happy about that. You'd have to look at those issues."

Kim McCuaig, Carleton's director of alumni relations, says Aykroyd left Carleton for greener pastures.

"He didn't graduate, but he was a student in good standing. It was just that he got an offer to go to Toronto to work with Second City (Comedy Troupe)."

Lucy Watson, president of the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA), says she is hesitant about the name change.

"Before we do anything we should look at the contribution he has given to Carleton students both academically and socially."

Wallace says "Aykroyd's family has been a regular and generous contributor to CKCU's annual funding drive for many years."

Rob Jamieson, CUSA vice-president internal, says CKCU must submit a proposal for a referendum question. CUSA council will then vote on whether to hold the referendum and decide on the wording of the question.

But the referendum may be a moot point, says McCuaig. "Students are not authorized to name buildings on campus. Buildings are named by the board of governors of the university," he says.

Charles Watt, secretary of the board of governors, says any proposals for a name change must be presented to the president in writing. The president presents the proposal to the board of deans, who may pass it to the executive of the board of governors. The executive may then decide to send it to the board of governors, who can pass it with a majority vote. Once passed by the board of governors, the name change is official.

Carleton students have mixed feelings about the proposal.

"He didn't actually graduate from the school," says Carleton student Amanda Blaine. "We should name it after an actual graduate who did something with their life."

In 1989 McGill students voted to name their student centre after McGill alumnus William Shatner, who is best-known for his role as Captain Kirk in Star Trek, and who currently hosts the TV program Rescue 911. The university refused to change the name because of a policy against naming buildings after people who are still alive.

"We should at least wait until (Aykroyd's) dead," says Carleton student Aaron Archibald. □

Chris Rock's show disappoints many

by Ron Orlo
Charlatan Staff

A show by Saturday Night Live comedian Chris Rock didn't live up to the expectations of orientation organizers, says René Faucher, finance commissioner of the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA).

And it definitely didn't live up to the expectations of many audience members either.

Matthew Holden, a first-year arts student, says he and others present at the show were offended by Rock's insensitive jokes: "Many girls and guys left because of his sexist remarks about hitting women. In one joke, Rock explained that it didn't matter how many masters degrees a woman had, men would always rule because they could punch women out," says Holden.

The Sept. 7 show was supposed to be the headline act for Carleton's frosh week activities, says Faucher. CUSA paid Rock $13,000 Canadian for the show, which was free for new students and orientation facilitators.

Faucher says Andrew Wadden, CUSA's entertainment production manager, contacted Rock's agent in the summer and got a demo tape. The tape was played for the orientation advisory forum, which is made up of some CUSA service coordinators. The group screens acts being brought in for frosh week. The group agreed that Rock's material was acceptable and they booked him, says Faucher.

Richard Stanton, CUSA's orientation commissioner, says the people on the forum "were all in favor of bringing in a budding black comedian."

Faucher says "we were not originally looking for a comedian but more of a big-name attraction. We had already booked many bands so a comedian with a name like Chris Rock was exactly what orientation week needed.

"Then about three days before the show we found out that Chris Rock had previously done a show at Western University in London, Ont., and bombed terribly," says Faucher.

Faucher says he heard that the Western show "just wasn't funny," although he didn't hear that Rock told offensive jokes. He says Rock's show at Carleton started out as expected.

"Rock's act was the same as the demo tape for the first half of the show at Carleton, but then people started to hassle him and he lost his cool and started telling offensive jokes. After an hour and half he just gave up and got off the stage," says Faucher.

He says the crowd was rowdy at the beginning of Rock's show. "There was heckling, and people trying to be part of the show."

Faucher says frosh groups were cheering at one another, which he says threw Rock off his routine. "At the very end of the show, he got offensive," says Faucher. "He just stood around without any routine."

CUSA President Lucy Watson says she had the authority to pull Rock from the stage and was on her way to do so "when he left of his own volition."

Faucher says he has spoken with Wadden, who says Rock fulfilled his contract with Carleton. But Faucher says he "has a problem with that. He strayed from what was on the tape." Wadden is away right now and is expected back soon.

Renée Twaddle, co-ordinator of the Carleton Women's Centre, says she originally favored bringing Rock to Carleton.

"I was pushing for Chris Rock to come because he was the first black man act to come to Carleton in 51 years, with the one exception of Ice-T, but paying him $10,000 (American) for a pathetic, offensive act... it was scandalous," she says.

Saturday Night Live regulars Adam Sandler and Kevin Nealon were also available for the Sept. 7 performance, says Stanton.

Twaddle says she wants to develop a CUSA board which will better review potential acts for offensive material.

"I want to wipe out acts that are slaming women, gays, black people, disabled people, etc.," she says.

"Last year Carleton had brought in lesser-known comedians which had the same offensive manner," says Twaddle.

CUSA received similar complaints during last year's orientation week about comedians Mike Wilmot and Tim Steves, who made offensive jokes about homosexuals and incest survivors. □

Shiny happy frosh raise cash

by Drew Edwards
Charlatan Staff

Frosh dodged traffic and got down on their hands and knees to shine shoes for Shinerama, the annual national fundraising event for the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation.

Carleton frosh students canvassing on Friday, Sept. 10, raised about $47,500 for cystic fibrosis research and treatment, says Carleton University Students' Association President Lucy Watson. While that kind of money is substantial, it falls short of this year's goal of $60,000 and is down from last year's total of $55,000.

Myra Sweeney, a first-year political science student, says students may have been burned out by the orientation activities of the previous week. "Everybody was exhausted from having so much fun," says Sweeney.

The ability Shinerama has to inspire students to dodge dangerously between cars while canvassing for charity is unique, she says.

"Most people liked us because we were excited, running around and stuff," says frosh Sweeney. "We didn't get much negative response."

Watson says bad weather and economic hardship, may have been factors in the decline of donations. She downplayed the cumulative effects of orientation week.

"Shinerama is always held on the last Friday of frosh week," says Watson.

Pia Pietrangeli, president of the Ottawa chapter of the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation, says "Shinerama is seen as one of our most important fundraising projects, not only because of the money that it raises, but also because it exposes a group of people to cystic fibrosis that normally wouldn't be." □

Flashing incident third in Loeb building

by Naomi Bock
Charlatan Staff

A woman working alone in a computer lab of the Loeb building was repeatedly grabbed by a man wearing only running shoes on the night of Sept. 4.

A safety poster circulated about the incident says "the victim believes she knows the suspect."

The poster describes the man as Caucasian, five feet 10 inches, 170 pounds, with short, dark, wavy hair. He could not pronounce the letter "s."

Len Boudreault, assistant director of the department of university safety, says the incident is under investigation.

This is the third case of indecent exposure and the second assault in the Loeb building which have been publicized on a safety poster at Carleton since June.

An earlier incident of indecent exposure including physical assault involved two women. It occurred on the night of June 18, in the same lab room (room C460) as the Sept. 4 incident. According to another poster, a bearded man only in a T-shirt and running shoes "indecently touched" one of the women.

Six days previously, on June 12, a man indecently exposed himself to a woman studying in the lounge in room B743 of the Loeb building at 6:40 p.m.

Marilyn Marshall, the dean of social sciences, suggests women working late at night should work in pairs or teams.

She says the Loeb building is generally safe for women. "I don't think it's different than any other building."

Marshall says limited security resources are part of the problem. "There are not enough patrol people to adequately . . . patrol, by a long shot." She says her office is looking into installing emergency buttons beside each machine in the computer lab.

"Meanwhile, we're just telling people to be careful."

Boudreault says it is impossible to step up security around the Loeb building, because the department doesn't have any extra staff. "We're doing what we can with what we've got."

On June 23, a 34-year-old man was arrested and has since been charged with two incidents of indecent exposure. The incidents occurred by the Rideau River.

The man was identified by a woman who recognized him from an incident on a different occasion.

by Brent Dowdall
Charlatan Staff

The Carleton University Students Association (CUSA) held an emergency council meeting Sept. 8 to "stop the rumors, because there have been ripe rumors running around," according to CUSA vice-president internal Rob Jamieson.

So right away, President Lucy Watson and the rest of CUSA council went in camera, that means behind closed doors . . . again.

Councillors dutifully followed Watson from Baker Lounge to a fifth-floor conference room, marking the fourth time in two months that council has gone in camera.

Although we may never know for sure what was said once the door was closed, since councillors can't talk about what was said, Watson said in the open that the matter was "staff-related," which has become a buzzword for "the union" and the Ontario Labor Relations Board hearings that concluded recently in Toronto.

Two weeks ago, the board decided CUSA violated the Ontario Labor Relations Act by firing two of its service coordinators this summer and has yet to decide if it interfered with the employees trying to unionize.

After council went in camera, some CUSA service co-ordinators involved in the labor dispute surrounded the deserted meeting table in Baker Lounge, waiting anxiously for council to return.

Co-ordinators Wayne Ross of the Student Academic Action Bureau, Renée Twaddle of the Carleton Women's Centre, Peter Nogalo of the Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Centre, and Brenda Kennedy of the Foot Patrol, were less than pleased with the turn of events.

Twaddle called the co-ordinators' lawyer, Michael Church.

She says he told them to knock on the door and ask council to let them into the meeting, or to bring the meeting into the open, because the labor hearings were a public matter.

The co-ordinators knocked on the door and asked to be let in. After a short discussion by council behind closed doors, architecture rep Sheldon Baker told the co-ordinators that council would like to continue the meeting as it was, with only councillors present.

In the meantime, councillor René Gallant left the meeting. Since council waited almost 20 minutes before the meeting while it scrambled to scrape together the required 18 councillors for quorum, it was presumably lost when Gallant walked out the door.

But when The Charlatan interrupted the meeting to ask if the meeting had quorum, council chair Dave Gregory only said "no one has called quorum."

Rob Jamieson, CUSA's vice-president internal, says a meeting can continue even if less than 18 councillors are present, though no voting can take place.

A councillor can "call quorum," which requires the council chair to take a head count of how many councillors are present.

If the chair finds out the meeting has lost quorum, Jamieson says the meeting can either continue "as an informal discussion," can recess until enough councillors return to the table to regain quorum, or can be adjourned.

Watson said later that the meeting adjourned because quorum was called but that was close to half an hour after The Charlatan knocked on the door.

Hidden fees can add up for students

by Pamela Paterson
Charlatan Staff

A Carleton student could pay the university's administration up to $1,300 on top of tuition this year because of ancillary fees that are not regulated by the provincial government.

Tuition fees are regulated by the provincial government, but ancillary fees for such things as parking, locker rentals and tuition deferrals are not.

This year, the university plans to make $2.4 million more than last year in ancillary fees. Last year, the university made about $33.08 million from the fees.

Administration can set its own prices for services like late fee payments or faxing of transcripts, says Kristine Haselsteiner, vice-president external for the Carleton University Students' Association.

"CUSA has had a number of talks (with administration). Unfortunately, there's nothing we can do about it. The government hasn't put any block on ancillary fees," says Haselsteiner.

Gary Anandasangaree, CUSA's vice president of academics, says CUSA fought to have these fees cut last year at board of governors meetings, but failed. He says CUSA will continue lobbying the board this year.

Jack Kettles, Carleton's director of finance, says increases in ancillary fees are administration's attempt to meet rising operating costs.

"(Students) must recognize the price involved and that the fees are in line with other institutions," says Kettles. "It is a recognition of reality and the services the university has to provide."

Kettles says an expansion in the Ontario Student Assistance Program will help some students offset the increased costs. But regardless, students can be hit with several costs everywhere they turn. Here's where.

Beginning the Year

Tuition, which ranges from $2,372.55 to $2,980.05 for an undergraduate year, depending on the program, includes compulsory miscellaneous fees of $346.55 to $361.55. The exact fee also depends on the program. The fees cover services such as health insurance and a Unicentre maintenance fee. You will be charged an extra $40 if you pay your tuition in two instalments. Missing the Sept. 10 deadline for payment means a late registration charge of $120.

Getting a parking permit can empty your pockets of anything between $280 and $700, including taxes. Getting a locker costs $15.

Hidden Costs

Writing a supplemental or grade-raising exam costs $50 for an on-campus exam and $100 for an off-campus one. Requests for grade reviews also cost $50.

Charging students for supplementals and grade-raisers may make these services inaccessible to students who don't have the money, says Anandasangaree.

"This is saying only upper-class students can take supplementals," says Anandasangaree. "It should be a student's right to write a supplemental or grade-raiser without any fees."

"Our priority right now, because it seems the university is reconsidering offering grade raisers and supplemental exams, is to ensure that we have them offered. After that, we will continue to fight additional fees on these exams," says Anandasangaree.

Colleen O'Connell, a second-year commerce student, says she was surprised to learn writing a supplemental cost $50.

"I can understand charging because it's extra paperwork, but $50 is a little excessive," she says.

Taking courses at another university and applying the credits to your program requires a letter of permission from Carleton, which costs between $25 and $100, depending on the course. Transferring credits from another university costs $150 per course.

While students can get their final grades on the touchtone registration system, a hard copy of a statement of marks costs $6. It is mailed free of charge. Faxing costs between $3.25 and $8.50, depending on where the statement of marks is faxed.

Library

Overdue fines run at 50 cents per day for books, $1 per day for five-day reserve material, and $1 per hour late to a maximum of $20 for instructional television tapes. When you return overdue material, return it to the circulation desk and pay immediately. Otherwise you'll have to pay your bill at the business office, which will cost $3 plus the amount of the fines.

Athletics

The $127 non-refundable athletics fee, which is charged as part of the miscellaneous fee every student pays, does not include everything. Squash and tennis courts cost from $2 to $4 per game. The yearly rate ($66-$116.25) is not a better deal, but it guarantees you a set playing time on the courts.

Lockers are free at athletics. It costs $4 to rent a lock, of which $3 is returned when you return the lock. Athletics also rents lockers for $60 a year.

WHAT YOU MIGHT FORK OUT

Late registration charges	$120 (min)	$120 (max)
Deferred tuition payment	$40 (min)	$40 (max)
Statement of marks	$6 (min)	$6 (max)
Faxing statement of marks	$3.25 (min)	$8.50 (max)
Supplementals/grade-raising exams	$50 (min)	$100 (max)
Challenge for credit	$150 (min)	$150 (max)
Parking pass for year (incl. tax)	$279 (min)	$705 (max)

Boudreault says the man was in no way connected to Carleton University. He says he can't release the name of the man charged because he didn't know the status of the charges. The case is being handled by the Ottawa Police.

Boudreault could not say if the suspect is connected with the June incidents in the Loeb building. He says there have been no more incidents of indecent exposure along the Rideau River and attributes it to more frequent university safety patrols and Ottawa Police horse patrols in the area.

Brenda Kennedy, co-ordinator of Carleton's Foot Patrol, says women should take flashers seriously.

"There is a misconception that flashers are harmless exhibitionists, but there are cases of escalated actions that can go as far as assault."

Renée Twaddle, the Carleton Women's Centre co-ordinator, recommends getting away from the assailant and making a report with a detailed description. "They are not just thrill seekers," she says.

The experience can be extremely frightening, says Nancy Adamson, co-ordinator for the Status of Women Office at Carleton. "Although indecent exposure is technically not assault, some women feel very upset, very frightened, very assaulted."

Last year, her office set up a meeting for victims of indecent exposure to discuss their experiences and feelings. "It is serious. You don't know, in a moment, what else he's going to do." □

The Secret Diary of Alex the Frosh

by Alex Bustos
Charlatan Staff

I felt like a cow as I was herded through frosh week.

Accepting all, I nodded and obeyed every order. When I was instructed to scream, "Attitude check: Fuck you!" I complied.

Remember, a good frosh eats, drinks, looks totally lost, and moves only when told to do so.

So, screw Nietzsche and Plato, we had a poutine tank dive. After a week of proudly proclaiming my ignorance, I can shout with a heart full of pride, "I'm a Blues Brother and I'm on a mission from God!"

This year's frosh theme was Carleton Nights Live. Frosh groups were named after famous skits from the TV show Saturday Night Live.

My group, glory be thy name, was the Blues Brothers.

Being a dedicated journalist, I arrived late on the first day. After waiting in line in a parking lot for roughly 40 minutes, I got my frosh kit.

Contents were as follows: mug, poster-size Carleton calendar, boxer shorts, green wristband (frosh event pass), T-shirt, pamphlets and condom.

Cows must fornicate safely, you know. They also have to lose their voice. Screaming, yelling, mooing and howling, the various frosh groups declared their right to exist.

It seems that all frosh must perform destructive surgery on their vocal cords. Ditto for the liver.

Due to discriminatory drinking laws and a nasty cold, I didn't participate in this year's drinking orgy. As for my fellow Unknown frosh plucks tag from poutine tank (he won a phone).

frosh, their livers suffered the equivalent of the Exxon Valdez disaster.

Fuck, people drink like fishes here! It was like watching the biggest boozehead in high school mutate into 3,000 people. I'm amazed that the sewers of Ottawa weren't backed up with the spew that went down many a toilet.

Speaking of vomit repositories, Chris Rock's show at Carleton was the blowout of the week. His show was recycled trash in the tradition of Andrew Dice Clay.

Let's face facts: the show stunk. Kevin Hughes, another comedian who performed for frosh, had jokes resembling Rock's.

But, unlike Rock, Hughes read the crowd, had original material and didn't come across as a jerk.

Hughes's joke about his wife sticking a broomstick up his ass sounds crude on paper. However, he made it humorous.

After his broomstick joke he said, "I don't know how gays can do it." Many raised the concern that this joke was homophobic. I did not feel he was insulting gay people. Hughes made it clear he was going to make fun of everyone: male, female, gay, straight, but wasn't going to demean these groups.

There's a fine line between poking fun and insulting others in order to attain laughs. Rock based his show on abusing others. Hughes did not.

Minipalooza, featuring the Headstones from Kingston and local acts Illegal Jazz Poets and Furnaceface, was another crowd-pleaser.

The Illegal Jazz Poets started things off with their mellow sound. The Headstones took over with an excellent show that moved the audience to scream and dance along.

By the time Furnaceface took the stage, the call of Oliver's had reduced the crowd significantly. The 300 to 400 people who stuck around got to see what the Furnaceface hype is all about.

The week was not totally devoted to being an idiot. Movies on date rape and homophobia were shown to frosh and talks were held after. Both movies were welcomed warmly. However, my gut feeling told me that some of the crowd clapped due to fears of being labelled a redneck.

This doesn't mean frosh are narrow-minded. It just indicates that we have had, in many cases, very little exposure to discussions focusing on homophobia and sexism.

These educational talks were informative and necessary. Remember, some of us have gone to schools where sex education is still frowned on.

On a brighter note, I did sense that a good majority were sincere in their desire to eradicate prejudice on campus.

The educational presentations told us it's okay to admit your biases, for only by doing so can you remove hate and ignorance.

In retrospect, frosh week was informative, insane, interesting, and in some cases, downright stupid.

I was, in the truest sense, a lost cow being led through the meadows of Carleton. □

PART-TIME / CASUAL EMPLOYMENT

At present a number of part-time and casual employment opportunities are posted in the Centre. Students interested in obtaining this type of work are strongly advised to consult our job boards.

JOB SEARCH SESSIONS

Group Sessions: Graduating students should take note of the group sessions offered by Placement & Career Services. Please sign up for the sessions at the front desk.

Networking/Job Search: This session focuses on networking, researching the labour market, the visible and hidden job market, various job hunting approaches, developing a job search system and common pit falls.

The Resume/Covering Letter:

This session discusses self assessment, the purpose of a resume, how to prepare a resume, skill identification, components of a resume, resume styles, as well as the covering letter. Samples are reviewed to determine how to maximize effectiveness.

Interview Techniques: This session reviews the purpose of the interview, the employer's and the candidate's goal, the stages of an interview, commonly asked questions and preparation tips.

CAREER FAIR '93

Approximately 40 different public and private sector employers and associations will be on campus Wednesday October 6th and Thursday October 7th, 1993 to provide company information and to discuss career opportunities. The Career Fair will be held in Porter Hall (2nd Floor Unicentre) between 10:00 am and 4:00 pm. All students should take advantage of this opportunity to obtain career information.

OCR Briefing Sessions

These briefing sessions will focus on the On-Campus Recruiting Program, preparation of application forms, skill identification, interviews, employer expectations, and job search in general. The sessions are targeted towards specific disciplines, however, students from all disciplines are welcome to attend any session.

NAC president's talk slams racism

by Karin Jordan
Charlatan staff

Sunera Thobani's bottom line is equality.

Thobani, president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women (NAC), outlined the organization's view of the struggle for equality in a speech at Carleton Sept. 13.

NAC is an umbrella group which represents about 500 women's groups across the country. It lobbies the federal government on issues concerning women in Canada.

About 100 people attended the talk, entitled Equality is the Bottom Line — NAC Election Strategies.

Thobani focused on racism and other forms of discrimination, leaving NAC's election strategy to The NAC Voter's Guide, which was being sold at the speech.

The 132-page guide outlines issues women can question candidates about, including child care, social programs, violence against women, breast cancer, lesbian and gay rights and electoral reform. The guide was co-authored by former NAC president Judy Rebick and Huguette Léger.

Thobani said Canadians must challenge economic and social inequality.

"NAC is going to... make sure issues of equality are not put on the backburner." Challenging systemic racism is an important part of NAC's agenda, she said.

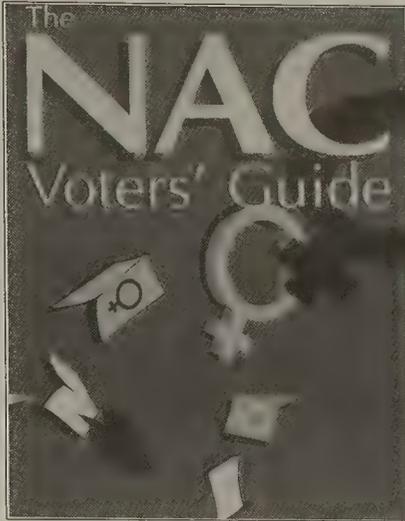

"We live in a society which has been structured around the lines of race... so of course racism permeates every aspect of our society," she said.

Thobani said the women's movement must focus on challenging racism. "The question is not does (racism) exist within the women's movement... The question is how do we stop the women's movement from continuing to maintain racism?"

Some in the audience wanted to hear more about concrete strategies for change. Krista James, a fourth-year philosophy student at the University of Ottawa, found Thobani's speech had "too much rhetoric and not enough practical suggestions. She didn't tell us how to unite."

"I felt she was being overly optimistic about our capacity to work together," said James.

But Ravi Malhotra, a fourth-year political science and law student at Carlecome out, but what has pushed us is the Tory track record.

"I think what we have seen with this federal government is that they have declared a war on democracy and on equality, and they have declared a war on the rights of women."

Thobani said while Prime Minister Kim Campbell isn't merely Brian Mulroney in a skirt, she cannot escape the Tory legacy.

ton, thought Thobani did her best. "I think she had a very important message. Her focus on race and class in a very open and direct way was refreshing. She tries to link up the issues."

Thobani was critical of the present government's record. "It's been a very hard decision for NAC to

"At the end of the day, Ms. Campbell is running as the head of the Tory party."

Thobani was critical of Tory cuts to social programs, increasing unemployment and the "absolute no-discussion of a national child-care program."

Although Thobani said NAC is maintaining a non-partisan stance, some audience members were all too eager to take a partisan stance. During a question period, representatives of the federal New Democratic Party, the National Party and the Canadian Party for Renewal all took the microphone to promote their cause.

Ottawa South NDP candidate Ursule Critoph said Thobani wasn't encouraging women to take action.

"I feel women have to do more than ask questions. They have to get active and influence what's going on," she said.

Thobani said NAC's strength lies in bringing women together from different backgrounds.

"If we are committed to democracy and if the women's movement is committed to equality for all women, then there is no choice but to work together," she said. "Because as long as we tolerate any level of inequality, we will never have a society that is based on social justice."

Thobani said young women had a role to play in working for change and suggested they join NAC. After her speech, Thobani told The Charlatan women should challenge course curricula at their universities to make sure courses are inclusive and representative.

The speech was co-sponsored by the Carleton Women's Centre and the Institute of Women's Studies. □

Carleton students speak out on the federal election

by Steve Dobrenski
Charlatan Staff

Canada has been plunged into a federal election campaign for the first time in five years. As part of The Charlatan's election coverage, students will get a chance to voice their opinion on the issues and personalities affecting the Oct. 25 vote.

The Charlatan caught up with some students Sept. 10, two days after the election call, and asked the following question:

What is the most important issue to you in the upcoming federal election?

"To me, one of the most important issues, one that should be pulled out, is improving education for young black people."

Tiferanji Malithano,
Arts III

"The economy is the big one. A lot of people say they will try and do things, but whether or not they will do it is another thing. They say the recession is over, but I don't buy that."

Kris Schimiec,
Arts I

"The environment. Without that we're nowhere."
Steve Boldt,
Arts II

"The most important issue would be the employment issue. Hopefully, they will create jobs for students while they are in school, so they get working experience while they are training."

Students may vote at home or at university in election

by Steve Dobrenski and Arn Keeling
Charlatan Staff

Before making a decision at the polls in the upcoming federal election, many students must decide where they are eligible to cast their ballot for the Oct. 25 vote.

Students away from home who are qualified to vote in this coming election may register to cast their ballot in their home riding or in the local riding of their university.

Elections Canada has started a campaign to inform students about how to vote in the Oct. 25 federal election.

Information packages will be distributed on university campuses across the country to encourage students to vote where they want, says Denise McCulloch, community relations officer and youth liaison for Elections Canada.

"Registration is so easy, it isn't funny," McCulloch says.

To vote, a student must be a Canadian citizen who has turned 18 by Oct. 25. Students away from home will need to register for a special ballot.

The registration can be found in a booklet available at any post office. McCulloch says it important to register soon in order to receive your ballot in time.

A completed registration form must be received by Elections Canada by Oct. 20, the Wednesday before the election, and your completed ballot must reach Elections Canada by 4 p.m., on Friday, Oct. 22.

If you want to vote where you are attending school and you were enumerated for last year's federal referendum in your school's riding, you are on this year's voters' list. If not, McCulloch says you are able to register at the poll in your school's riding on voting day.

Last year, Elections Canada organized a large student awareness campaign for the October referendum called Voting's a Breeze. Elections Canada officials visited universities including Carleton to publicize student participation.

This year, McCulloch says, the onus to inform students will be put more on student councils.

"We hope that student associations will do some sort of information tables," she says.

The Carleton University Student's Association (CUSA) plans to help students find out their voting eligibility, says Kristine Haselsteiner, CUSA's vice-president external.

"I think it's one of our main priorities," she says.

Haselsteiner says CUSA wants Elections Canada to set up an enumeration booth on campus to inform and enumerate students who will be first-time voters in this election.

"I think there has to be special concern given to students," she says.

If you have any questions you can contact Elections Canada at 1-800-267-8683, or 1-800-361-8935 for the hearing-impaired. □

Hurtig promises free tuition if elected PM

by Brent Dowdall
Charlatan Staff

In the Oct. 25 federal election, new parties may have an unprecedented impact on the outcome because of widespread voter disenchantment with the established parties.

If this happens, Mel Hurtig and his National Party of Canada are hoping to be in the thick of the fight.

Hurtig, a successful Edmonton book publisher, was elected leader of the new National Party when it was formed by 45 members last November. Hurtig was one of the key forces behind the party's establishment.

Party membership has grown to 6,500 since its founding convention in Ottawa. Hurtig says the party originally wanted to run 50 candidates, but now hopes to run 155 candidates in all 10 provinces, including John Foster in the riding of Ottawa Centre. The deadline for nominations for the election is Sept. 27.

Hurtig also wrote the party's policy book, A New and Better Canada, which outlines some of Hurtig's ambitious ideas:

- The party's fundamental economic policy is full employment.
- National standards in health care, social programs, the environment, multiculturalism and bilingualism.
- Reduced taxes for individuals and families and increased taxes for large corporations.
- Cancellation of the Free Trade Agreement and the North American Free Trade Agreement.
- The party would legislate against increases in foreign ownership and corporate concentration and would provide government aid to small- and medium-sized Canadian-owned businesses.

• The party would outlaw corporate and union donations to political parties in political campaigns, including corporate and government donations from outside Canada. It would also limit third-party election spending, which is advertising by national lobby groups for or against political parties.

• The party would reform federal elections by implementing a system of proportional representation, where political parties would receive about the same number of seats as their popular vote.

• The party also advocates binding referendums on major issues, including the Free Trade Agreement and NAFTA. Hurtig says his party's election budget, National Party Leader Mel Hurtig.

$1.8 million, is a "fraction of what the traditional parties spend." Hurtig says his funding comes from private donations from individuals rather than from corporations or unions.

The official spending limit for each party during the campaign is $10.6 million.

"The old-line parties spend a bundle in advance (of the campaign)."

In a telephone interview with Hurtig less than an hour after the election was called Sept. 8, The Charlatan asked Hurtig about his party's positions on the issues.

Charlatan: Let's start with economic policy.

MH: The fundamental policy of the party is full employment and putting Canadians back to work.

After the hole that the Liberals and the Conservatives put us in, we have to make major changes. That includes reform of interest rate policy, exchange rate policy, trade policy, manufacturing policy, natural resources policy and taxation policy.

We don't think you have to spend money. The changes are fundamental to the whole Canadian economy.

Charlatan: Are you going to "soak the rich?"

MH: Average Canadians pay way too much tax. Big corporations pay way too little. They must pay their fair share of taxes.

[A New and Better Canada says the National Party would increase corporate taxes to the average rate of the other 23 countries of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development.]

Charlatan: Will the National Party get rid of the Free Trade Agreement and NAFTA?

MH: The FTA has been horrendously negotiated and its results have been disastrous. In the four years before the FTA was negotiated, the Canadian economy created 1 million 24 thousand jobs. In the four years since, we've lost 246,000 jobs.

If you take people off unemployment insurance and welfare, you can reduce the deficit.

In the four years before the FTA, new investment increased 38 per cent. In the four years since, it has decreased by four per cent.

Given their economic record, I don't think the Conservatives could run a corner drug store for six months.

Charlatan: What about education?

MH: Young people are our most precious resource. But there are young people who can't afford to go to school, who can't get in, and classes that are too big.

Education is absolutely a top priority. We are adamant that there should be no tuition fees and the cost of a student's education would be paid back through the income tax system. They would pay nothing while in school. We think that's an infinitely fairer way.

Charlatan: Eliminating tuition fees would take a massive amount of money from the operating budget of post-secondary institutions. How do you make up for that loss?

MH: That amount could be easily made up through changes to the tax system.

Charlatan: Education is a provincial responsibility. How does the federal government improve the quality of education?

MH: Well, for one thing, we won't decrease transfer payments the way the Conservatives have.

We can influence post-secondary education and we will increase federal spending on post-secondary education.

Charlatan: You're trying to attract the votes of ordinary Canadians, but you yourself are anything but ordinary, as a successful book publisher and officer of the Order of Canada. How do you attract the ordinary Canadian?

MH: Most of our members have never belonged to a political party before. Our party is not made up of stars, or people who are looking for a government appointment or contract. I have no trouble relating to a farmer or a nurse.

Our party also has a higher percentage of its members as young people than any other because young people are attracted to two issues, sovereignty and cleaning up Ottawa.

We loved what happened last Oct. 26, with the defeat of the Charlottetown accord. It was important for democracy in Canada, where one side had all the money, and still lost. □

Local gay bookstore has books seized

by Clayton Wood
Charlatan Staff

David Rimmer knows first-hand the power Canada Customs has to decide what reading material gets into this country.

Rimmer operates After Stonewall, an Ottawa bookstore that specializes in gay publications.

He says Canada Customs is playing the role of judge and jury at the border when it comes to deciding if gay erotica and other controversial material should enter the country.

"It's perfectly okay to sell material in this country that shows two guys having sex. You just can't bring it across the border," says Rimmer.

His bookstore experienced its latest row with Canada Customs in July. Customs stopped a shipment of 130 books to After Stonewall, 51 of which were detained. The books contained gay erotica without pictures, although Rimmer says, "I wouldn't call this stuff educational."

Most of the material detained at the border does not contravene the obscenity law as set out in the Criminal Code of Canada. This law prohibits the distribution of material deemed obscene, which includes the undue exploitation of sex or sexual material depicted with crime, violence or degradation.

However, it is Canada Customs' interpretation of the obscenity law that angers Rimmer.

While portraying anal sex between consenting adults is perfectly legal, some Canada Customs employees have used a department memorandum to seize some imported descriptions of acts it deems obscene.

Memorandum D9-1-1 is Customs' guideline for what is acceptable sexual material to cross the border. Imported depictions or descriptions of anal penetration are prohibited unless they are in the context of communicating educational information, such as preventing the spread of AIDS.

Exception is also made if the material "communicates in a rational and unsensational manner information about a sexual activity that is not unlawful . . . (or) goods which communicate information about anal penetration committed in private between a husband and wife or between two consenting adults . . ."

Rimmer says the memorandum allows politicians to wash their hands of any potential blame for censorship, since "the memorandum is an order-in-council from the representatives of several ministries, and never went to Parliament. No one has to take responsibility."

The memorandum, adopted at the cabinet level in 1991, did not require parliamentary approval because the Criminal Code itself was not amended.

Canada Customs can sometimes detain a shipment for as long as eight have also had material detained under the memorandum.

But Canada Customs denies it is singling out material bound for gay and lesbian bookstores.

Don Labelle is a spokesperson for Customs. He says some of the blame for border hold-ups lies with the shippers.

He says books in a shipment that are not detained are released right away, and "it's the shipper who waits to send all the books up at once, rather than have to make two trips. It's just good business sense on their part."

Technology is making the job of stopping sexual material at the border more difficult. There are currently no restrictions on the electronic transmission of material into Canada. This loophole allows gay and lesbian erotica to be beamed electronically into the country and then reprinted.

Rimmer's store carries magazines that are printed in Canada but carry stories and photographs that originate in the U.S.

"It's an area where technology is way ahead of the law," says Jessie Goldman, a student working in the legal services division of Canadian Heritage, the federal department that inherited the former responsibilities of the Department of Communications in July. The department is in charge of government involvement in broadcasting, culture, arts and heritage.

"It's very much a grey area. No regulatory regime of electronic transmissions exists," says Goldman.

Goldman said prior to the reorganization of the department, the government was studying ways of monitoring electronic transmissions. □

NUG

NEW UNIVERSITY GOVERNMENT

WHAT IT IS:

Student representatives voicing your academic concerns at departmental and faculty levels.

HOW IT WORKS:

- NUG reps have voting power equal to that of any faculty member.
- They attend faculty board meetings and vote on such issues as:
 - Fair exam scheduling
 - Struggle for more Teaching Assistants
 - Guarantee of supplemental exams
 - Equal academic access to all students

BE A PART OF IT!

- Decisions made at faculty levels affect you throughout your university years and beyond!
- There is one seat for every department, every faculty, in every year.
- If you're interested, call Sen at 788-2600 ext.1266 or Gary at 788-6688.
- Vote in the NUG elections!!

This is official notification that Elections Carleton will be holding NUG Elections. Nominations will take place from September 20 to 27, 1993, validation on September 27 and 28, campaigning from September 29 to October 4, 1993, and voting from October 5 to 6, 1993. For more information, call Sen Sridas at 788-2600 ext.1266, Gary Anandasangaree at 788-6688, or James Rilett, Chief Electoral Officer at 567-6772.

VOTE OCT. 5-6

Just a little respect, please.

Welcome to Carleton. This year's frosh have been given a swell introduction to the university during orientation week.

If they weren't being offended by comic Chris Rock, they were being hassled at their friendly campus bar.

Rock, a Saturday Night Live comedian, performed for frosh on Sept. 7 and offended some audience members with his sexist jokes.

To add to the merriment, some Carleton football players were admitted to a frosh party at Oliver's. Facilitators were warned to keep frosh away from some of the team's members, as some players were using the opportunity to hit on anyone available.

So, now's the time to call for changes to be made, wrongs to be set right. Let's find somewhere to lay the blame on thick, right?

Of course, there are precautions that might have stopped such problems from happening.

For example, in the case of the incident at Oliver's, strictly apply the rule that frosh events are for FROSH only. That way, if problems do arise, at least facilitators could step in and take charge of the situation.

In the case of booking comedians, couldn't there be a line in their contract which says if they don't live up to specific guidelines, then they don't get paid? If they can't promise they won't offend people in a major way, why book them at all?

But, regardless of whatever measures are taken, they won't really strike at the heart of the matter. Any preventative measures are only reactions to problems, but they won't solve the problems themselves: namely, how do you get rid of all the offensive crap in the world? Blame could be piled higher and deeper all over everyone at Carleton, but it still wouldn't get rid of it.

Comedians at frosh week last year offended some people and it happened again this year. There were incidents of harassment on campus last year and sadly, there will probably be more this year. Screening comedians or holding sensitivity seminars may make people aware of the problem, but it doesn't solve the problem itself.

No matter how well-screened comedy acts are, no matter how safe we try to make our little university world, the solution lies in changing peoples' attitudes and that may be near to impossible.

There will probably always be people who want to cause trouble. There will probably always be comedians like Chris Rock and people that want to laugh at his jokes. There are some things that you just can't change by setting up a committee.

Since it's the beginning of the year, let's stay idealistic. While we're not all swamped with work, why not try and change the world? There are three things that can be done to help get rid of the evil that runs rampant in the world.

Instead of calling for heads to roll, look inside your own and try to figure out what needs fixing. No one but you can change your own attitudes.

Also, if you see something you don't like, try and fix it. Don't let people get away with it. Kudos go to all those who walked out on Chris Rock or otherwise disturbed his performance.

Finally, have respect for one another. Perhaps too simplistic a message in the dirty world today, but why not give it a try? It certainly couldn't hurt. SK

ARAFAT AND RABIN CATCHING UP ON THE 'LOST YEARS'...

ESSAY

Wild times in the big city

by Stephanie Garrison
Charlatan Staff

Last May, my options for the summer looked pretty grim. Staying at home and working a non-career-related McJob while fighting with the folks didn't appeal to me.

Rather than partaking in these pleasures, I chose an obvious solution: get the hell outta town and escape to New York.

Finding a nice apartment in the East Village took patience, balls, and a lot of cash. Rent for my three bedroom was over $2,000-monthly, exterminations included. After subsidization, my cut per month was $650 American for a medium-sized bedroom with high ceilings — almost triple what I pay in Ottawa.

I lived on the edge of ultra-violent Alphabet City. Just like any schlocky inner-city TV show, gunfire spats would rock me to sleep during June heat waves.

Weirdshit would happen at crazy times. I never thought that I'd help put out a fire, and people falling out of windows was something I was used to seeing only on television. They were, however, the surreal experiences that just sort of happened when I'd walk home at dawn after a long night out dancing.

Despite increased commercialization (a Gap store recently invaded the space previously housing the alternative St. Mark's theatre), there were still cool shops and cafés nestled between tacky souvenir shops on the tree-lined streets.

Almost-famous people like Quentin Crisp, the eccentric British dilettante/party-goer (famous for being "out" decades before it was "acceptable"), lived two blocks away, a few doors down from the Manhattan chapter of the Hell's Angels. Filmmaker Jim Jarmusch would hang out with the owners of Atomic Passion, a fifties furniture store across the street from my apartment.

Entertainment-wise, New York has both advantages and downfalls. Quality is elusive, even if you are seeing someone who is usually considered talented. Case in point: Sonic Youth's Kim Gordon performed with her boring and amateurish side-project Free Kitten at Club Nell's, but was followed with a great set by Luscius Jackson, a fabulous all-girl band you'll soon hear more about.

Venues and ticket prices are large and expensive compared to other cities; the flip side of this is that you'll see shows that would never be performed anywhere else. I was fortunate enough to see the avant-garde Diamanda Galas sing a wondrous new work that was mind-blowing.

Club culture is taken seriously in New York, and action passes at a fierce pace. The nightlife is infested with droves of vacuous club kids. Keeping up with the cutting edge of hip is their occupation.

A club will enjoy an intense, star-packed night, only to become unpopular a few weeks later. Promoters and DJs hop from basement dives to warehouse locales to get involved in as many happening clubs as possible, before fading into obscurity.

Some clubs do last for more than a brief spell, largely due to the strength of a particular scene. Most "alternative" clubs fit this bill, and they were where I felt most in my element. Most nights I'd hang out at near-famous joints like the Knitting Factory.

It was my craziest summer, and I befriended an eclectic mix of brilliant minds and low-lives, mostly by accident. The first person I met was a guy who pulled me out of the path of an oncoming cab. I never expected to meet sane and interesting people in such a hostile environment, but somehow I did.

Keeping track of daily events was impossible. There always was something going down. It was an intense love/hate experience that I don't want to repeat, but I plan to return to New York City next summer. **□

Marijuana.

To legalize it or not to legalize it: that is the question.

The legalization of marijuana became a dead issue after the "Just Say No" campaigns of the '80s.

But watch out '90s - the issue has been reborn. With politicians admitting to their experimentation with marijuana, average citizens are questioning why they can't legally smoke up too.

Especially when they consider the possible scenario involved with marijuana use: In a windowless room several people hover over a bright orange flame. They pass a joint from lip to lip, covertly inhaling the illegal plant. Sitting on the cool cement floor they savor their sweet high until . . . raid: the cops bust the party, fingerprints, criminal record, no job, burnt dreams.

This hypothetical scene raises the blood pressure and sends ripping streaks of frustration through the body of former MP Jim Fulton (NDP - Skeena), who introduced a marijuana bill (C-140) in the House of Commons in late April.

The bill has two main clauses: the Campbell/Charest clause and the Clinton clause.

The Campbell/Charest clause proposed amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act to prevent "out of the closet" marijuana users from being discriminated against on the basis of their admission to marijuana use. The clause is named after Prime Minister Kim Campbell and deputy prime minister Jean Charest because they both admitted to trying the drug in the past.

"Kim Campbell and Jean Charest are hypocrites for thinking they could smoke marijuana and not others," says Fulton.

The Clinton clause proposed changes to the Canada Immigration Act to allow admitted marijuana users entry into Canada. This would ensure that the American president, who smoked the drug but didn't inhale it, would not be turned away at the Canadian border.

Fulton, prior to becoming an MP in 1979, worked for six years as a probation officer in British Columbia. He says it put him in touch with many doctors, lawyers and other professionals who were penalized for publicly admitting to marijuana use.

The bill was received with typical political ambiguity, with MPs like Dawn Black pledging some support within Fulton's own party. Liberal MP Lloyd Axworthy and Conservatives Jim Edwards and Patrick Boyer said they wouldn't comment before further examining the bill.

HEMP POT REEFER

But Fulton is not running for his seat in the next federal election, and all bills in the process of being debated prior to it have been nullified. Unless Fulton can convince another MP to present C-140, it is a dead bill.

But the issue of legalization rages on, and is far from dead. Last year, Line Beauchesne, a professor of criminology at the University of Ottawa published a paper on drugs and civil rights in Canada, which cites the prohibition of marijuana as the reason why 20,000 young people are arrested each year for marijuana possession. Beauchesne says keeping marijuana illegal is the same as the old prohibition laws on alcohol — they don't work.

"Keeping marijuana illegal isn't stopping people from using it. It's just causing users to hide from the law," she says.

Beauchesne says the many taboos connected with marijuana use, such as being regarded as a law-breaker and a flower-power stoner, along with years of anti-marijuana propaganda such as the "Just Say No" campaign, have made many people leery about legalizing marijuana.

Beauchesne's own stand is indecisive. She says she supports the idea of removing the stigma attached to admitted marijuana smokers but is disturbed by some of the health risks associated with drug use.

Beauchesne says putting an OK stamp on the marijuana plant would change its place of distribution and consumption. In this case, marijuana users could enjoy a better quality product and will be free to smoke in public.

Instead of smoking pot in the confines of a vacant basement, you would be inhaling it at the bus stop. Rather than receiving your order of marijuana in an opaque lunch bag stashed between the layers of a salami sandwich, you would pick up the drug from your local pharmacist or purchase it on the street corner in a clear plastic bag. This way, the quality of the marijuana could be regulated.

"The reality is that we are a drug using society. Our culture sanctions drugs for recreational use," says Philip Moorman, director of the David Smith Youth Drug and Alcohol Centre in Ottawa.

Moorman says the legalization of marijuana will not lower the number of users. He says regardless of marijuana's legal status, some people will always have addictive drug habits, and his centre will always be in business.

There is, however, a budding entrepreneur in London, Ont., who hopes to attract many buyers to the marijuana plant. Late in July, The Great Hemporium was puffed into Twenty-two-year-old Christopher Clay is proud to be the first store owner in the city to sell hemp products and edible treats to his customers. While it is illegal to sell the marijuana plant, it is legal to sell the fibre and seeds because you cannot get a high from them.

"Cannabis seed is high in protein, and the oil that is pressed out from the seed is low in saturated fat," says Clay.

The strong fibres of the hemp plant can be processed to make rope, clothing and environmentally friendly paper products.

The store attracts mostly high-school students, but the occasional senior citizen can be found poking around — nibbling on a cannabis-seed chocolate chip cookie, buying a hemp-made dog leash, or signing a petition to legalize the medical use of marijuana, says Clay.

Lucia Del-Santo, a director of Help End Marijuana Prohibition (HEMP) also based in London, Ont., would like to see the medicinal value of marijuana legally for the patients to recovery. Del-Santo co-ordinates the organization's campaign to give doctors the legal right to prescribe marijuana to their patients.

Del-Santo wrote a letter in May to Kim Campbell, defence minister at the time, asking for her views on the legalization of marijuana, after Campbell had admitted to using it prior to the Tory leadership convention.

"Prime Minister Campbell returned our letter, when she was minister, saying that doctor's could already legally prescribe marijuana to their patients," says Del-Santo.

But many doctors say there are a lot of legal anti-nausea drugs in today's market that far exceed the usefulness of marijuana.

Fifteen years ago, Dr. Anwar Haq of Ottawa prescribed marijuana for his cancer patients undergoing chemotherapy treatments as an anti-nauseant drug.

He says patients varied in their responses to the drug. Some patients who reached a high from the drug liked it, but others got no high from the marijuana treatments, and were not relieved of their nausea.

"Today, the medical usefulness of marijuana has been superseded by more effective anti-nausea drugs, such as Zofran," says Haq. "In medical terms, marijuana is a passé drug."

But some people, like 28-year-old University of Ottawa student Tom Mantha, grit their teeth in anger when a drug they believe can be used to treat the ill is described by doctors as "passé."

If marijuana had been valued for its ability to treat glaucoma sufferers, Mantha says his aunt would not have had to "go under the knife." Glaucoma is a disease which causes pressure to build up behind the eyes, and can eventually lead to blindness.

According to a Harvard University study, cannabis is "two or three times as effective as any current medicine for reducing ocular pressure." As a natural prescription for glaucoma, cannabis doesn't produce toxic side-effects to the liver or kidneys, or cause any case of sudden death syndrome associated with the legal pharmaceutical glaucoma drugs.

"People should be able to grow marijuana, smoke it and use it for personal use without having to pay stupid penalties," says Mantha.

But another student, Rowena Hart, who is an asthmatic, tells of her claustrophobic experience at a party that was rockin' with pot.

"I wasn't smoking the drug but if the cops came in I too would be busted, and that's what's scary about the illegality of marijuana," says the 21-year-old.

Sgt. Richard Marcoux of the RCMP's drug awareness co-ordinator for the National Capital region, says the legalization of marijuana consumption may not reduce the number of arrests or the cost of law enforcement.

Marcoux says law enforcement concentrates on drug traffickers rather than users, and that as well as marijuana, traffickers usually deal in other hard drugs such as heroin and cocaine.

The leading problem with decriminalization is the health hazard linked to marijuana, he says. Referring to marijuana's mood-altering properties, "We can't expect a productive society from a bunch of marijuana users," Marcoux says.

The Addiction Research Foundation, a provincial government in the sixties to deal with people lost in hallucinogenic delirium, but it has since become an information hotline on which you can speak confidentially to an anonymous "information specialist" in regards to addictive substances.

When The Charlatan called, the information agent we spoke to emphasized the subjective nature of any use of cannabis.

According to the agent, where the marijuana is grown, harvested, how it was shipped, how old it is and even what effect a person thinks it has, can affect the user's experience.

Some can develop a "psychological addiction," but due to the variance in experience this too is a highly subjective consequence.

In terms of health risks stemming from marijuana use, the agent made the distinction between chronic and casual users. The chronic user stands a much greater risk of developing lung cancer due to the amount of tar accumulated in the lungs.

But Dr. Louis Morissette, a specialist in drug and alcohol rehabilitation in Ottawa, says like any mood-altering drug the short-term relief of stress and the quick-fix effect of marijuana is not worth a defunct society.

"Marijuana chronically destroys people and their lives," says Morissette. He says by legalizing marijuana, the cost to the health care system would rise in terms of psychiatric treatment.

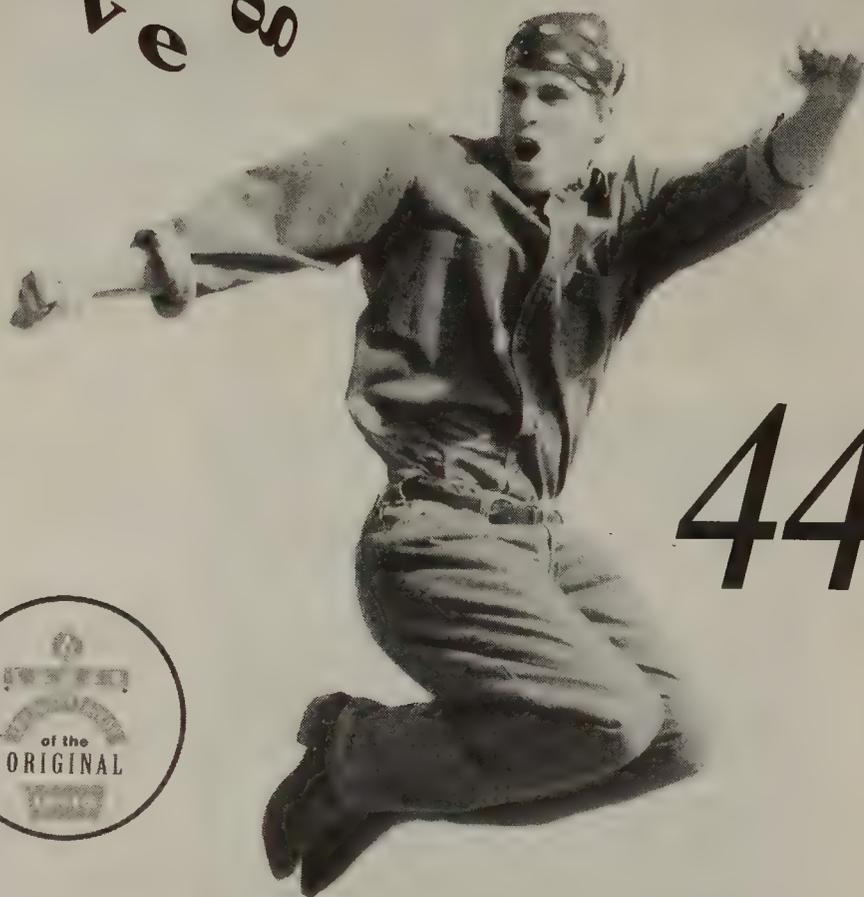

"What we need is education. We need to educate parents on how to deal with stress in a more productive way," he says.

But the question remains unanswered. To legalize or not to legalize?

For some, legal highs on a beach towel or a nostalgic inhale with a group of Baby Boomers are considered an innocuous pleasure.

For others, the fear of a motivation-zapped future generation doesn't seem worth the right to publicly roll that marijuana joint. They don't see responsible members of the community being produced from a cloud of illicit smoke. q

Ravens fumble home opener

A little respect.

That's what the Carleton football team is looking for this season. And just one game into their season, they've already found it.

The Ravens lost 22-17 to the McGill Redmen Saturday, Sept. 11, in front of a crowd of about 500 at Raven Field.

But it was the way they lost that showed promise.

Despite falling behind 22-3 while committing seven turnovers, the Ravens still managed to fight back to respectability, displaying defensive composure, offensive movement and scoring two late touchdowns in the fourth quarter.

"We will win games as soon as we stop beating ourselves," said head coach Donn Smith. "We're a team of 50 per cent rookies and we can't win if we turn the ball over like we did today."

The Ravens fumbled the ball five times and sophomore quarterback Sean O'Neill threw two interceptions.

"It was the errors that did us in," said defensive co-ordinator Gary Shaver. "That gave them good field position and hurt our chances."

"But the key term for this game and this team is potential, this year and in the future," he said. "We lost 22-17 to a good football team and we had a lot of miscues. For us to be this close in a game with that many mistakes is a positive sign."

McGill coach Charlie Baillie was quite happy to escape with the win.

"They gave us a scare," he said. "It was the first game of the year and we didn't know what to expect. I figured we had the game in control, and then I got concerned we would give the game away."

The Redmen scored first on a 21-yard field goal from Andrew Boon. Following a turnover, Boon then missed a 34-yard attempt and McGill settled for a single.

A valiant Carleton defence stuffed the Redmen twice on the one yard line before McGill running back Chad Luedtke punched through the defensive line for the game's first touchdown.

The Ravens blocked the convert attempt but gave up another single when Boon's 70-yard kickoff sailed through the end zone.

Carleton's first score came on a 34-yard field goal by Chris Giacobbi in the second quarter.

Luedtke gave the Redmen an 18-3 halftime lead following an eight yard run for his second touchdown game.

In the second half, the Redmen added another four points for a 22-3 bulge before Carleton mounted a comeback.

Atoning for his first-half jitters and miscues, O'Neill hit rookie running back Chris Dorrington with a five-yard TD toss and then, with mere seconds left on the clock, scampered into the McGill end zone for another score. Kicker Giacobbi converted both.

McGill hung on to the ball, the Ravens didn't.

With a roster including 35 rookies facing off against a McGill squad that is expected to contend for the Ontario-Quebec Interuniversity Football Conference Championship, much wasn't expected from this young Raven squad. But after a nervous first half, the Ravens began to show discipline and poise.

O'Neill was good on 12 of 18 passes for 111 yards and one TD. Besides that fairly impressive 67 per cent completion rate, he also ran six times for 44 yards and one TD.

"I started to feel comfortable in the second half," said O'Neill. "My offensive line did their job. For the most part I felt protected and had all the time I needed."

Smith was pleased with the poise O'Neill demonstrated in his first football start of the Canadian Interuniversity Athletic Union.

"O'Neill will be a very fine quarterback as soon as he learns to minimize turnovers," said Smith. "He's still learning. He's young. As the game wore on, he showed more and more composure, and we'll build on that next week."

Einard Jean-Francois was O'Neill's

the Ravens took to the field.

Carleton opened the scoring early in the game. With the Voyageurs line-up still being announced, forward John Lauro ran the ball down the centre to the left corner. He then crossed it over to Phillips, who scored on a header leaving the Laurentian goalkeeper stranded on his goal line.

"It's always important to get the first goal away from home because it puts pressure on the other team to score and it upsets their rhythm," said Mackie.

For the rest of the game, neither side was able to muster any offence. Although Laurentian did attack frequently, goalkeeper Steve Ball and his defence ably protected the 1-0 Raven lead.

The win was especially satisfying be-

"The confidence was there in the second half," said Jean-Francois. "It was nice to see new guys here who can move the ball down the field and make the plays."

Confidence and an ability to finish a drive is what's been missing on Raven squads in recent years. The Ravens were 0-7 last year and have won only two football games in the past four years. While they still absorbed a loss in their first game of this new season, at least they gained some respect. □

RANT 'N' RAVEN

Now or never for the men's soccer team

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

This is their year.

A year of expectations, ability, experience and revenge.

They are the Carleton men's soccer team and this 1993 season is their year to reach the national soccer championship.

Last year they were painfully close. A 9-1-1 regular season record put them at the head of the Ontario Universities Athletic Association east division. For most of the season, the Ravens were nationally ranked, peaking at number five in the country. The team was blessed with an abundance of youth, speed and talent.

Only a heartbreaking 2-1 overtime loss to the Laurentian Voyageurs in the east division final kept Carleton from advancing to the national stage.

But that was last year. It's over, gone and done with.

This is a new year -- their year to avenge themselves.

This year's squad is still quick and talented, but youth has been replaced with maturity and experience.

Returning to the Ravens after years away from university soccer, are defenceman Marty Lauter who has been playing with the Ottawa Intrepid of the Canadian Soccer League, and forward John Lauro, who won a CSL championship with the Calgary Kickers.

Along with the spirit of the team -- stopper Earl Cochrane, an OUAA all-star and all-Canadian -- the Ravens have one of the most experienced lineups in the province.

The only real loss for this team will be the absence of all-star midfielder Declan Bonnar, who is academically ineligible to remain at Carleton, and forward Robbie Saxberg, who has played out his five-year eligibility for a varsity team.

When all is said and done, this year's men's team is essentially the same -- but stronger.

It's their year and they know it.

You can see it on the field when they practise. There's a quiet determination evident in everything they do. Coach Sandy Mackie pushes them harder every practice. Each drill taxes them more, drains them and makes them sweat. And then another exercise begins. Again and again. Over and over. Yet there's no whining, no grumbling and no excuses offered.

It's the price a contending team pays to remain a contender.

And the Ravens are most certainly a national contender.

After last season's painful playoff exit, the Ravens are fully aware of their potential. It's not in the future. It's now.

This is their year to win. It's not a season of rebuilding, of making progress or settling for anything less than being the best.

They have the talent. They have experience. If they have the desire, then nothing should stop them.

This is their year. □

Raven men exact revenge in victory

by Shannon Fraser

With revenge on their minds, the Carleton men's soccer team walked into Sudbury to face the Laurentian Voyageurs -- the team that defeated them in divisional playoff action last year.

Revenge was sweet.

Ravens forward Basil Phillips scored the first, only and decisive goal of the game, to shut out the Voyageurs 1-0 and avenge that playoff loss.

"It's always good to start the season with a win," said head coach Sandy Mackie, "particularly when playing Laurentian."

About 400 Laurentian fans yelled names and taunted the Carleton team as Raven men prepare for run at national soccer title

by Sarah Richards

It's shaping up to be another impressive season for Carleton men's soccer. The team is coming off a 1-0 win on a hostile pitch against their stiffest opposition, the Laurentian Voyageurs. And it seems that what the Ravens have lost in last year's players, they have gained in experience.

Here's a pre-season look at what to expect from this year's team.

COACHING: After coaching his team through a 9-1-1 regular season and losing to Laurentian by one heartbreaking goal in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's east division finals, the Great Scot -- head coach Sandy Mackie -- returns for his second year at the Ravens helm. Mackie will be assisted by former soccer Raven David McFall.

GOALKEEPING: Veteran Steve Ball returns to the Ravens for his third year as goalkeeper. The six-foot-tall Ball is at the heart of the Raven's solid defence, having allowed a mere six goals during last year's regular season. He has the hands, the confidence and the strong voice needed to be a superior goalkeeper. His weaknesses are goalkicks and crosses. Frankie DeCaria is back for his second year as substitute keeper. DeCaria is a capable goalie although handicapped by his small size.

DEFENCE: Mackie says he does not plan to make any changes to last year's defensive lineup. Fifth year veteran Earl Cochrane will backstop the Ravens at the stopper position. Cochrane's formidable size, skill and strategy helped earn him the title of all-Canadian for his position. He'll be joined by 20-year-old Mike Zaborski, whose confidence and abilities have earned him a spot as sweeper. Joining them on defence will be Andre van Heerden, a four-year veteran whose fitness ranks with Cochrane's strength, as well as former Ottawa Intrepid Marty Lauter who will be replacing the departed Robert Rogers.

MIDFIELD: Returning to the midfield are Jeff Knight, Les Walden and Chris Scullatto. Supporting Raven midfielders include Joe Gabor, Mark Baumgartner and rookie Daniel Amieu.

OFFENCE: Faced with the loss of offensive stars Claudio Escobar, Declan Bonar and Robbie Saxberg, there was some question as to who would replace their offensive output. Enter Naoki Ogasawara, the forward who sat on the bench most of last year. He's one of the most skilled players on the team, although he may suffer in heading because of his small size. His agility and skill at crossing bodes well for the Ravens. Look to see him working closely with fullback van Heerden. Forward Basil Phillips is back looking fitter and trimmer than ever. Phillips will be joined by former pro John Lauro, who won a Canadian Soccer League championship while with the Calgary Kickers. Second-year striker Andrew Wooldridge will also provide a scoring punch if he can stay healthy and avoid knee injuries.

CONFIDENCE: Despite the loss of some key players from last year's line up, Mackie is confident his 1993 team will contend for the national championship. When asked what his team's greatest weakness is, he responds without hesitation: "We don't have any." □

Women's soccer team takes aim at another playoff berth

by Bram S. Aaron
Charlatan Staff

Still a puzzle.

This is how women's soccer coach David Kent describes the way his team is shaping up for the coming season.

After three straight fourth-place finishes in the six-team Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletic Association east division, Kent is anxious to improve on the team's complacent record this year.

"Our goal is to climb out of fourth place and surpass four wins for the season," says Kent.

In anticipation of that goal, here's a preview look at the 1993 edition of the women's soccer team.

COACHING: Kent is back for his sixth year at the helm. Assistants Karen O'Connell and Fred Juett round out the coaching staff. They'll be looking to instill some life into a program that's standing still with a five-year 22-26-2 record. Without a strong and imposing offence, Kent says he will likely adopt a defensive posture and hope to capitalize on opposition miscues.

GOALTENDING: Rookie Kristina Bacchi will handle the goaltending chores. Hersize and punching ability will be a bonus in the Raven net. Sarah Richards and Carric Harper provide capable backup.

DEFENCE: Christine Archibald, a skilled strategist, returns to lead the five-person defence. Joining her are returning defensive stalwarts Corine van Ryckde Groot and Ann-Marie Irwin. A host of rookies are vying for the final two defensive spots.

MIDFIELD: A big question mark. With all of last year's starting midfielders gone, rookies will be expected to fill the three-person midfield as well as provide offensive support.

OFFENCE: Offensively, the team will miss striker Susan Holmes who scored eight goals last year -- over half of the team's total of 15. Co-captains Mary McCormick and Kathy Keegan will attempt to replace her on the attack. They're both veteran players who work well together and will be expected to provide strong leadership to a young squad. Newcomer Genni Lussier, a Concordia transfer student also adds offensive support.

In exhibition play in Quebec last weekend, Carleton lost 3-0 to Sherbrooke University on Sept. 10 and then rebounded to beat Bishop's University 4-0 on Sept. 12.

Sherbrooke dominated the first game, capitalizing on Carleton miscues.

"It was our first game together as a team," said co-captain Mary McCormick. "We were a bit unorganized at the start of the game."

In the Bishop's victory, the Ravens rebounded to dominate the Gaiters outshooting them by a 20-to-1 margin.

"We controlled the play from the first whistle to the last whistle," Kent said. "The players played as a unit."

Scoring for Carleton were Angela Code, Nancy Sheppard, Stacey Doherty and Jennifer O'Brien. □

Ravens field hockey looking ahead

by Ray Verbyla
Charlatan Staff

Over the past few seasons, the Carleton women's field hockey team has begun to show improvement.

Last season was a breakthrough year, as the team advanced to the Ontario championships for the first time in three years.

This was the result of a much improved offence which scored seven goals during the season -- four more than the previous two seasons combined.

Riding the wave of this offensive improvement, coach Suzanne Nicholson led the team to a 3-6-4 record. She also earned the coach of the year award from the Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletic Association.

Now the team is looking to bring their game up another level.

As the majority of this team is now entering their third year together, Nicholson says their maturity level is increasing. She hopes to better last year's 3-6-4 record by converting on more scoring opportunities in close games. Last year's three wins and four ties could easily have been seven wins and no ties with a little bit of luck, she says.

From a team roster of 15, six players have returned from last year's squad including midfielder Suzanne Bird, forward Krista Wilson and link Vicki Wilcox -- all of whom participated in the Canada Games this summer on provincial field hockey teams.

Also returning to Carleton and providing experience is former Raven goaltender Julie Sudds, who studied at Guelph University last year.

That core should provide mature leadership, says assistant coach Terry Wheatley.

"We're a more experienced team this year as opposed to being an inexperienced team like we were in the past."

Although final cuts have yet to be made, about a dozen rookies from all over Ontario are competing for the remaining four starting spots and four bench spots on the team roster. Nicholson doesn't expect to make final cuts until she has evaluated the rookies' performance during the next two weeks. This new wave of rookies will be expected to fill in the gaps left by eight team members who have moved on.

The resulting mix of veterans and rookies should provide a balanced team, says Nicholson.

Team practices began at the end of August and have carried through to the regular season.

The Carleton team trains off campus at Lansdowne Park. Practices begin at 6 a.m. Tuesday to Friday on the astroturf of Frank Clair Stadium. Team members warm up by running along the Rideau Canal for half an hour, then go through drills for offence and defence.

Divisional play has been scrapped for the upcoming season by the OWIAA. Instead of two divisions, all eight teams in the league have been thrown into one pool. Six of the eight teams will make the playoffs and Nicholson hopes the Ravens will be among them for a second straight year.

The regular season begins on Sept. 18 when the Ravens travel to Kingston to face the Queen's Golden Gaels. The following weekend, they begin a three-game homestand on Minto Field at the Nepean Sportsplex against Toronto, York and Ryerson. □

Fugazi kicked all-ages ass. True to the hype surrounding their arrival, these archetypes of politically correct punk put on a tight and intense performance. In the case of Fugazi, go ahead and believe the hype.

The band, hailing from Washington, D.C., demands and deserves a fair bit of respect. Frontperson Ian MacKaye did his musical teething in the punk band Minor Threat. Among other things, Minor Threat recorded the song "Straight-edge," which helped to define an alternative lifestyle free from drugs and alcohol.

MacKaye has carried this attitude over into Fugazi, probably one of the few truly politically correct bands in existence. The band members are strongly anti-commercial and don't allow themselves to be drawn into the usual gimmicks of the record promotion business.

Fugazi refuses to charge more than $6 for a show and only plays all-ages shows. There were no Fugazi shirts on sale at the gig on Saturday night and if you paid more than the $10 printed on the back of your copy of In On the Kill Taker, Fugazi's latest disc, then you've probably been ripped off.

Before the first note was played, MacKaye gave the mandatory speech against rough moshing during the show. What was different here, however, is that MacKaye meant every word he said.

"Let's save this crowd-surfin' phenomenon for Lollapalooza," MacKaye shouted at a pair of red-headed punks in the audience who wouldn't settle down. When he was told to stop preaching and get on with the show, MacKaye responded without hesitation. "I'm not a priest, but I can preach at you if you want. . ."

Somehow, I got the impression that MacKaye was much more sincere than Eddie Vedder's "a-song-is-nothing-in-comparison-to-a-human-life-man" Lollapalooza speech, since it didn't come across as an ego-stroking publicity stunt.

Ian MacKaye works up a sweat.

The band barely stopped for a breath between songs, keeping their performance strong and intense until they ended their 75-minute set.

Most impressive was the way all the band members avoided the usual rock star poses and just played, although MacKaye flung himself around the stage like a possessed white male. Bassist Joe Lally helped keep the rhythm with his tight control over the direction of each song. Throughout, the bass lines moved fluidly from a slow, ominous rumble to a more groove-oriented rhythm.

Instead of tedious guitar solos full of fretboard masturbation, Fugazi experimented with the dynamics of guitar sound, volume and groove.

As a whole, the experience of Fugazi playing was like a precisely controlled sonic boom. It goes without saying that the audience wet themselves when, halfway through their set, Fugazi launched into the Zaphod's anthem "Waiting Room," followed by "Bulldog Front" and "Bad Mouth."

Ottawa's Lockjaw and D.C.'s Shudder to Think were worth seeing as well, and the 50-or-so people who missed their opening sets lost out big time.

Lockjaw's set was dominated by their characteristic crushing tribal rhythms. Earlier on in their career, Lockjaw had a tendency to sound disjointed and uncoordinated, despite the talent of the individual members. Saturday, everything came together for the band. The end result was a non-stop assault of raw guitar and drum rhythm.

In contrast, Shudder to Think was slower and more melodic, which seemed to appeal to the older members of this all-ages audience. The singer had a delicate voice, which provided an ear-pleasing balance to the rest of the music.

The young'uns in the audience were not prepared to deal with anything that did not openly solicit slamming. Instead,

TOP TEN REASONS TO LOVE FUGAZI

1. Ian MacKaye isn't just the president of the Hair Club for Men, he's also a client.
2. Ian's the original Entertainment Boy™.
3. The enjoyable fireside chats after their shows.
4. They make a mean Manhattan.
5. Their knowing fashion savvy.

Chris Rock: he just wasn't funny, folks

Chris Rock

Sept. 7

To my surprise, Chris Rock is a bad comedian.

For years, I have considered Saturday Night Live to be a mediocre show. Alongside Dana Carvey and Mike Myers, I thought Rock was the only performer with talent.

That was until his frosh-week show here at Carleton.

It wasn't that I found his performance particularly offensive. The problem was that he had no routine at all. His show consisted of cheap, poorly told locker-room jokes.

"Anybody here fuck their girlfriend on their period?" isn't funny or original.

A good comic shows his audience a creative view of the world. Rock showed us a frat party.

To make matters worse, he committed a major faux pas: he pissed off his audience.

Calling a pro-choice rally "a great place to meet women" and an easy place to get laid didn't win him any fans. Then, to greater scorn, he began to tell the audience that he doesn't use a condom "because it gives her a chance to change her mind."

In the end, his show was annoying, not offensive. It's just a shame that the undergraduate students' association shelled out $13,000 for frosh to have a really bad time.

The only thing there was to cheer about was that he cut his losses and performed for only 40 minutes, instead of the scheduled two hours.

As the show progressed ever-so-slowly, small groups of people began to leave. I heard one audience member heckle. Others could be heard mumbling that he was a sexist pig and an asshole.

Chris Rock isn't being charged, tried and hung by the forces of political correctness. He is just a really poor comedian who was reduced to asking his audience, "Any questions about Saturday Night Live?"

Not quite your average fairy tale

by Hana Ahmad
Charlatan Staff

Photographing Fairies
Steve Szilagyi
Random House
321 pages
$13.00

The old adage rings true once again. You can't judge a book by its cover.

Photographing Fairies is definitely not your average fairy tale.

Although the reader encounters an enchanted garden furnished with innocent little girls, fairies and edible magic flowers, the resemblance ends there. There are no happy endings or just rewards, and distinctions between good and evil become very blurred.

The strength of this novel lies in its subtle blend of the believable and the fantastic. The author uses an age-old children's medium to express the bitter reality of human nature.

This combination caught me off guard and held my interest throughout.

The novel begins on a depressing note as the narrator, photographer Charles P. Castle, recounts the story from a dingy London prison cell. The plot revolves around a set of alleged fairy pictures, which are brought to the photographer's studio by Walsmear, a hick town cop. Since the fairies appear only as tiny smudges on the photographs -- which can be caused by dust or pollen -- the photos don't conclusively reveal their existence. The rest of the novel follows the quest undertaken by Charles to prove or disprove the fairies' existence.

Not surprisingly, the other characters set out to tamper with the results of the investigation. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle (yes, of Sherlock Holmes fame) and his spiritualist daughter wish to have the photographs destroyed, for fear they will contradict their own set of fairy photographs which they hope to release to the press.

In addition, two thieves, Paolo and Shorty, want the photos for monetary gain.

Charles begins his quest in an attempt to find adventure but later develops an interest in subjugating the fairies for scientific examination.

Regardless of each character's motive, they are all alternately portrayed as evil as a result of their obsession with fairies. There is not absolute evil, only shades and degrees of evil.

For instance, Charles watches his character erode until he observes, "I . . . couldn't believe my ears. I sounded like some rough type being shooed off a street corner in the north end."

Nobody is spared the corruptive force of the fairies. The Tempelton girls, who are described by Charles as full of "innocence, purity and the springtime of life," maliciously break the spines of the male fairies in order to protect the females.

This was the most effective plot twist, illustrating that innocence is not necessarily the antithesis of evil, reminiscent of all those naive Disney classics.

In the end, even the fairies are yified, as they are the root cause of the novel's tragic ending.

One flaw of this book is the characterization. Although Charles's character is fully developed, Szilagyi doesn't delve as deeply into the minds of most of the other characters.

For instance, although Paolo and Shorty represent perhaps the most sinister forces in the novel, they come across like Saturday morning cartoon villains.

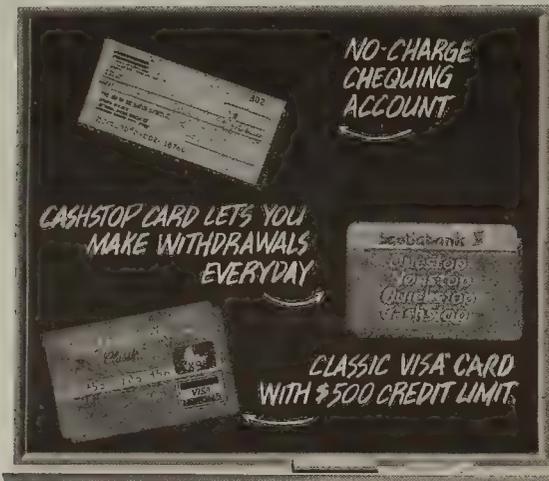

Perhaps the message to be taken from this novel is that human intervention in the world of the fantastic is never advisable.

Although this is not a light point, the book is interspersed by ridiculous comic interludes reminiscent of Charlie Chaplin or the Three Stooges.

In one scene, Charles has his valise stolen by a pair of porters-cum-train robbers. The passengers are saved when the hoodlums are repulsed by photographic chemicals that are thrown into their eyes, following a prolonged wild goose chase.

Comic relief is also provided by the habits of the outlandish characters: an exercise-crazed reverend and his young philandering wife, the morally-challenged local barmaid, and Ron, an anally retentive photographers assistant.

With this book, Steve Szilagyi has created a sophisticated, convincing -- even realistic -- version of the quest for the fantastic, one which weeds out the stereotypes so that no single character is left off the hook. If my little brother ever read it, this book would destroy his childhood, but it was a refreshing change from Cinderella. □

Fear and loathing in the music industry

by Josée Bellemare
Charlatan Staff

here's a battle brewing in the United States over used CDs. For people who believe compact disc prices are too high, used CDs are a god-send. They're cheap, easy to find and there's rarely anything wrong with them.

Students may be jumping and skipping at this opportunity to save money, but along the way, record labels are sticking their foot out to trip them.

But don't fear. With open arms, Cruz Records, based in Long Beach, Calif., is attempting to catch them before they fall.

According to the Los Angeles Times, American record labels fear the sale of used CDs because they suspect a reduction in purchases of new ones.

In the good old days of co-op advertising, record labels would supply part of record stores' advertising funds to promote the labels' records, increasing the profiles of both artists and music stores. In doing so, everyone made money.

Times have changed. Wesley Hayden, Ontario branch manager for MCA Records, says music labels such as Time-Warner's WEA, MCA Music and Sony, are refusing to underwrite print and radio advertisements for American stores which sell used discs to discourage them from doing so.

As a result, used-CD vendors in the United States will be stuck with an advertising bill costing millions of dollars, according to the Los Angeles Times.

"We don't like it," says Hayden of the sale of used CDs. "If we don't get money to fund the new artist no one is getting paid for that used CD."

On the opposite side of the debate lies Cruz Records, an independent record label. To combat the major labels' vendetta against used-CD sales, Cruz set up the Getting Even Ad Campaign in August to help stores which have been cut off from co-op advertising money.

Andy Dunkley, Cruz's publicist, says Cruz supplied co-op ad money to stores before, but decided to give their co-op venture a name in order to call attention to the major labels' non-sensical actions.

Dunkley says more used-CD vendors have been calling to get their co-op advertising dollars from Cruz as part of the campaign.

As for their motivation behind their moves, Dunkley says he thinks the major labels are trying to take all the cash for themselves.

"They will find anything they can to corner 100 per cent of the market," he says. "It's like trying to tell a car dealer that he can't sell used cars."

Dunkley says the major distributors are making a big fuss for such a small market. He says 0.5 per cent of music sales are from used CDs.

Hypocrisy on the part of the majors also comes into play. Dunkley says Columbia House, which is owned by the gargantuan label Sony, sells eight CDs for one cent and they don't pay any royalties to the musicians through this offer.

For now, this problem is confined to the United States. However, Dunkley says if the major labels continue with their actions, Canadian used-CD stores could lose their co-op advertising money.

"I'm sure if the major labels made a stand for it, the Canadian labels would follow suit." □

Well, hey! Used CDs are really popular

by Josée Bellemare

Charlatan Staff

Used compact discs are expected to account for up to 20 per cent of the CD market in a couple years, according to the Los Angeles Times, and Ottawa doesn't buck this trend.

Peter Allan Wigney, manager of the Ottawa record store Spinables, says sales for used CDs have risen more this year than other years.

"Business is hiking up because more and more people are learning about used CDs," he says.

What they learn is that used CDs can retail for up to half the price of a new compact disc, and still be in the same condition.

Sandie Savaria, a student at Bishop's University in Quebec, says she feels grateful for the low cost offered for used CDs.

"They're less expensive," she says.

"They usually have a good selection and they're in good condition."

Matieu Gagné, a junior college student in Quebec, is a bit more blunt. "It's a sham," he says of the cost of new CDs, which can run up to $22.99. "I think they're overpriced."

For some though, the low price doesn't make up for the thrill that comes from buying a new CD.

"It's like when you go to a store and you buy underwear and a hundred other people have tried it on," says Sophia Alleyne, a student at the University of Ottawa. "It's kind of personal."

What will happen to the used CD business? Will it flourish or will the major record companies stamp it out?

Peter Desserer, manager of Shake Records (which sells both new and used CDs), says sales of used discs, which is now limited to smaller stores and chains, can only go up.

"I think it's just going to get bigger.

Once two or three major chains do it (sell used CDs) — because it does well — all the other chains will be forced to do it," he says. □

Teaching the Educated to Read!

The main cause of student drop-out is stress — stress over not having assignments finished, stress over not staying "caught-up" with the class, and stress over the realization that just staying "caught-up" isn't going to be good enough.

1993 was the worst year in history for students getting jobs right out of college, and this next year looks even worse.

It isn't always the smartest students who get the best grades, but it is always the best readers — the ones who can get the most out of their books on their own.

Simply getting through your reading assignments will only give you the minimum that your professor requires to pass you. Just passing your courses isn't going to be good enough anymore.

In fact, having a diploma or a degree only allows you the opportunities of furthering your education with a more competitive group of fellow graduates.

The '90s will continue to be a decade filled with the most rapid change ever seen in history. Only those who are able to adapt to those changes will be able to remain competitive.

Being able to read all your reading assignments and additional reading selections with increased comprehension and recall will be a pre-requisite for anything you plan to do in the future.

The difference between a good mark and a great one will depend on your ability to read and learn on your own.

Power Reading is the Solution!

Power Reading is an eight-step video course that was developed on a college campus and initially designed for college students. With recent developments in video and computer graphics technologies, this course can now be offered on video, allowing you to learn in the privacy of your own home — at your own pace.

This course will absolutely at least double your reading speed with increased comprehension.

Around the world with Mouth Music

by Mario Carlucci
Charlatan Staff

While some bands slither like snakes into pop's netherworld of convenient labels, Scotland's Mouth Music delves into a multi-dimensional foray of raucous rhythm and subtle melody that's very accessible.

On Sept. 17, Mouth Music will initiate Ottawa audiences to See and Hear the World '93, the Museum of Civilization's latest concert series showcasing an international cast of ethnically diverse bands.

Their latest record, Mo-Di, is less of an exercise in so-called "world music" than their earlier self-titled release, but still provides a thoroughly eclectic synthesis of ancient and modern approaches.

The world music moniker, says band member Malcolm Swan, was more indicative of their earlier approach to diverse sounds and production.

"It's more appropriate for our first album. Things have moved away from that," says Swan.

Swan says being labelled as world music has "become a bit dodgy," but that the label has allowed Mouth Music to enter the stringently categorized halls of the major record stores.

Along with standard Scottish melodies, Swan says the band melds African drums "because they're the loudest" with other traditional instruments like conga, flute and the fiddle.

The use of sounds indigenous to other countries and the tendency to make them your own can be construed by some critics as appropriation, but Swan disagrees.

"Appropriate is a very loaded word. I

Have you ever seen a collection of trendier individuals?

don't believe in cultural property. We're foremost a Scottish band."

Swan says artists like Peter Gabriel and Paul Simon get accused of appropriation because their tendency is to use the music and talent of other musicians rather than play the music themselves.

Despite a global theme to the music itself, Swan says it makes no prophecies.

"I don't think we're into messages. We're into a bit more energy. Definitely strong rhythm and definitely strong Scottish accents in the melody. We like to see people dance. If people want to take the music at a deeper level than that, I think the songs are strong enough that they can."

While Mouth Music has been well received in Europe and the United States, Swan says Canada is the band's best draw.

"We've sold out in Toronto and we also find audiences here have been quick to get on their feet and dance."

Swan says he finds Canadian audiences to be more receptive to the diversity in the band's sound. He conversely characterizes Europe as "basically a rhythm desert."

Mouth Music takes this rhythm desert and provides listeners with an oasis of genre-defying music. If you're looking for innovation and diversity in new music, then Mouth Music is the first step towards that end.

Naturally, you can pick up any newspaper to see what cheesy Hollywood excitement has come down the pipe to your local corporate eight-bucks-a-pop movie theatre. But you're better than that.

There are at least four places to catch some cheap off-the-wall flicks without the added distraction of guffawing idiots and stale popcorn.

REPERTORY THEATRES

Repertory theatres play first-run foreign and independent films, as well as major films after they leave the big cinemas.

The best thing about these places is that you've got plenty of choices, since there's a high turnover of films and two or three movies are featured a night.

The fare at the Mayfair (1074 Bank at Sunnyside) runs from the bi-monthly showing of Rocky Horror Picture Show to independent releases like Reservoir Dogs. It's close to Carleton and although the seats are a tad uncomfortable, the interior is funky.

Yearly memberships are $10, including one free admission. If you're a member, admission is only five bucks, but still only seven semolians if you're a non-member.

turing Consent. It's close to downtown and features a classic marquee outside and balcony inside.

A Bytowne membership will set you back seven clams and admission for members is $4. Your non-member date will cost you $6.50.

Info on upcoming films at these cinemas is available at Info Carleton in the Unicentre. The best reviews and film suggestions are found — where else — in The Charlatan.

Other choices include the Cinéma-thèque Canada series and the IMAX/OMNIMAX theatre, both at the Museum of Civilization in Hull.

The Cinéma-thèque features obscure Canadian documentary and cinema as well as international films. Membership is only 10 bucks a year, which gets you into screenings for $4. It's pretty far away, but they have some fascinating titles.

For the cinema technology buffs, the IMAX/OMNIMAX theatre gives your surround-screen shows like Rolling Stones at the MAX and Titanica. The shows vary in price, with student admission ranging from five to 15 bucks.

So if homework's got you down, or you want to take your date somewhere dark (for whatever reason); check out your options. There's a thousand stories in the naked city; some of them are at your local alternative theatre. □

The Seventy Two Names of God

by Blayne Haggart and Dave Carpenter
Charlatan Staff

The Seventy-Two Names of God
Gallery 101
Sept. 9 to Oct. 7

That can one expect from an exhibit entitled The Seventy-Two Names of God? A religious work? Something of theological importance perhaps?

How about photos of naked bodies, with sacred religious text superimposed on genitalia for good measure?

That's pretty much what you get from this collection of five works by Simon Glass, a Toronto-based photographer. Using mostly nude photos of himself posing with various Jewish symbols, he has created a work with a theological dimension, the point of which can be very obscure to people not schooled in ancient Jewish mysticism.

As Glass said in his talk opening night, this is his effort to come to terms with Judaism and marks for him a personal journey to try and discover a part of the religion that doesn't conflict with his world view.

As for his world view, one gets the impression that it is a bit more sexual than Judaism normally goes for. After all, strict Judaism forbids the making of images of human bodies, which is tied into the commandment against making graven images. Likewise, it's common knowledge that the Judeo-Christian tradition isn't exactly made for hedonists.

There is a big debate going on within theological circles as to whether the Judeo-Christian tradition has lost touch with human nature, which just happens to have a definite sexual side to it. Glass exploits this side to the fullest, almost going overboard.

All photos are of the chest and genitalia only — no heads, no feet. His hands caress his body while his chest in some photos juts out. As one person at the exhibit remarked, it has a marked resemblance to gay porn.

This may have been due to the work "Shaddai: Almighty," which shows Glass wearing leather straps. These straps are actually tefillin, which are worn by pious Jewish men while they say their morning prayers.

In his photographs, Glass is concerned with exploring his effeminate side; thus, the poses are those that one usually attaches to female photos found in advertising. In fact, Glass says he uses the Sun's Page Three for inspiration.

As for the headless pieces, Glass says this is his effort to get away from using his photos to shoot characters. In doing so he avoids taking pictures of subjects and instead makes it more universal.

This he does quite effectively. The main work, "The Seventy-Two Names of God," is 18 prints wide by four prints high, all of either his naked body or a female's naked body, all of them in similar poses.

Viewed very quickly, the differences between the sexes is blurred. As with all his work, this goes back to the Judeo-Christian creation myths, one of which holds that male and female were once one and there are elements of each in the other.

"The Seventy-Two Names of God"

draws its name from Cabala, an ancient form of Jewish mysticism; each name is derived from letters from three specific verses in the Bible. These names have been used as a meditation since the 13th century. On each of the 72 photos is one of the names of God placed above the genitalia because, as Glass told the audience on opening night, he feels that Judaism has as its basis a profound respect for procreation.

The other works play with the human body and Judaism in the same way. "Ezekiel's Vision" is actually the story of Ezekiel's vision of God with the words screened onto what at first looks like a tablet but is in reality another of Glass's self-portraits.

Probably the coolest part of the exhibit is "Book of Formation," which takes letters from the Sepher Yetzira, a Cabalistic creation myth. Best of all, filling in the letters are photos of human flesh. The effect is fascinating.

This is not an exhibit that anyone can just get into. If you don't know about Judaism, this will just look like someone took some strange-looking characters and put them on some ordinary nude photos. It helps that there is a brief overview of each of the five works on hand.

This exhibit may be the result of Glass's effort to fit Judaism into his world view, but it is also full of overtones of guilt and effeminacy.

It's hard not to be impressed by the mystical power attributed to the letters, combined with blatant sexual images that are traditionally a religious no-no. They're works that really should be seen.

Discography

Lisa Germano Happiness
Capitol

A melding of soft syncopation, earthy mellow tones, and vigorous vocal work, is what Lisa Germano offers up for her new album Happiness.

Germano provides a sensitive person's guide to romantic healing and personal growth without ever getting preachy, whiny or soft. Her talent is highlighted by — but not limited to — her fresh and vindictive version of Nancy Sinatra's good ol' boots ditty.

The sounds on this album vary from driving buoyancy on "Energy" to the melodic forcefulness of "The Darkest Night of All."

Produced by Malcolm Burn, and reminiscent of other Burn-produced work like Crash Vegas's Red Earth, Germano's effort is a whirlwind of honesty, humor and poise.

Anyone looking for intensely surreal lyrics and brilliantly understated rhythm will certainly revel in this passionate yet focused treat.

Juliana Hatfield Three Become What You Are Mammoth/Attic

With her second album Juliana Hatfield, sometimes a Lemonhead and former member of the Blake Babies, has released another compilation of soft, sweet-pitched songs with elusive, ambiguous lyrics.

The first time out, on Hey Babe, Hatfield was the only constant element on the album. Now, she's backed by two friends, bassist Dean Fisher and Todd Phillips on drums.

In her first single "My Sister," Hatfield — who has two brothers but no sister — imagines what it would be like to have a sister. In the song, she contradicts herself by saying, "I hate my sister, she's such a bitch," and following it up with, "I love my sister, she's the best."

"Supermodel" plays with stereotypical images, demonstrating that Hatfield doesn't want to be recognized as just another pretty girl with a guitar.

In all the songs, her great melodic tone is matched with the perfect balance of polished and heavy guitars.

This CD is a sweet sing-along combination, capturing Hatfield's giddy spirit. The album closes with "I Got No Idols," which contains her best line, "I'm a liar and that's the truth."

Atlantis Bus
Watering Site
Independent

Are they pop? Are they Celtic? Are they just really mellow?

It depends on which song you're listening to.

On what is only a six-song tape, Atlantis Bus shift effortlessly from the easy Charlatans-meet-Simple-Minds groove of "The Road" to the pure Celtic joy of "Sea to Sea."

Plus, they're completely at ease moving from sound to sound. These Vancouver folks could open for the Wonder Stuff one night and play the next at the Highland Games in Maxville, Ont.

The rest of the cassette is very mellow and very good. This is a band to watch. If they stay together, they could go far.

Rymes With Orange, opening for Acid Test
Zaphod Beeblebrox
Saturday, Sept. 18

It was almost like a scene from Roadkill.

Somewhere in the Ontario hinterlands — just between Brampton and nearby Toronto — an independent rock band was on the road. The OPP had already nailed them twice for speeding. The van's transmission was replaced in a Winnipeg Canadian Tire parking lot. And I couldn't get in touch with them to do this interview. We played telephone tag for an entire week.

Finally, as they were sitting down for a Guinness and supper in an unnamed pub in the hinterlands, and as my Sunday deadline passed, bassist Nelson Sinclair and vocalist Lyndon Johnson called.

The Vancouver group has had a heady, hectic schedule in the last year: independently releasing their first album Peel and selling 7,000 copies of it, filming three videos ("Marvin," a cover of Small Faces' "Itchychoo Park" and "Memory Fade"), touring Western Canada in March, touring Eastern Canada in June and July. They're now running halfway through a 50-club cross-country tour. As well, Johnson and Sinclair did a quick European summer tour as a duo, visiting London, Frankfurt, Berlin and Amsterdam.

"We've only been around for two years," Johnson says. "We're quite happy with the way things are going."

One of the highlights for the group was the Music West conference held in Vancouver this past May. At last year's conference, Warner Brothers signed Pure, and Sloan used it as a showcase to Geffen Records before negotiating with them.

Rymes With Orange: they may not be able to spell, but oh, what fashion savvy!

Earlier in the week, I had phoned Bob D'Eith, the group's lawyer and one of its keyboardists. D'Eith is taking a break in Vancouver, the group's home base, as Steve Hennesey handles synths on tour.

"It was really good," says D'Eith of the conference. "We had a totally different approach. Last year we were looking to get noticed, but it was all 'Thank you very much, we'll give you our form rejection letter in the mail,'" D'Eith says.

At this year's conference, the group had a very professional-looking and -sounding album to promote, which they did relentlessly.

Rymes spoke with several record companies, including Hollywood, the new Disney-controlled label, but didn't commit to anything.

"At the moment, we believe we can do all this by ourselves, within Canada. It's got to be the right deal. It has to be a situation where the band has a lot of control," Johnson says.

For example, "Our next record we're going to do at home," says Johnson. "Instead of spending $20,000 on a studio, spend $20,000 and have a studio that we own. Then we can demo and do whatever we want."

Plus, as D'Eith says, "It was neat to turn some record companies away this time."

The busy pace has forced the group to make some tough decisions. Star Search, Ed McMahon's talent search/variety show, solicited Rymes for this autumn's taping, but tour commitments nixed that idea for this year.

Rymes also declined the opportunity to headline the opening night of a music conference in Manchester, England, to be held this month.

"Unless you're doing a European tour — which we're planning to do soon — it doesn't make economic sense. It's still the high season (for plane ticket prices)," D'Eith says. He added that they're planning an American tour after their European tour.

Rymes's music is rightly compared to British synthesizer-heavy pop. The band's songs are melodic and groovy. Aply, in 1992, Rymes opened both Peter Murphy and Echo and the Bunnymen's Vancouver shows.

More specific comparisons are made to the Manchester synth-and-psychedelia scene. This is courtesy of Johnson, who grew up there.

Johnson traded living in one rainy city for another, moving from Manchester to Vancouver 10 years ago. Johnson got together with the other band members, who were playing as the Nightwatchmen, and formed the group in 1990. Johnson came up with the Rymes With Orange — later purposefully misspelt.

"People start to think about the name. It's a good thing for the group. People always remember the name," Johnson says.

And why not? The group has been reinforcing the orange motif like a long-running joke, using orange stationary, putting orange scent in their on-stage smoke machine, giving away orange-flavored condoms, and looking into orange-smelling scratch 'n' sniff T-shirts. □

LONG DAY IN THE UNIVERSE

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 16 TO THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 23

Thursday, September 16

Sandra Shamas does her bit for the environment with My Boyfriend's Back and There's Going to Be Laundry II... The Cycle Continues. It's at the NAC Theatre, tickets are $19 and $27.50. It runs until October 2.

The Rocky Horror Picture Show plays at the Mayfair at 7 p.m. We don't have to explain it to you, do we?

Charlie Sohmer with Particles of Truth play their brand of roots/soul music at the Hog Rock Cafe in the Market tonight and tomorrow.

Montreal's Dysfunctions play the Penguin. Expect some avant-garde rock stuff.

Jimmy George play their oh-so-cool Celtic stuff at Creeque Alley.

Grimskunk rolls into Zaphod's tonight to play some loud music. Bring earplugs. Six dollars get you in.

Friday, September 17

Up With People is playing at Nepean's Centrepoint Theatre. Their show is described as "Suitable for the whole family." How 'bout this for an evening out on the town: McDonald's, Free Willy and Up With People. Tickets are $14 for students.

Black Triangle, Illegal Jazz Poets and another band play a benefit for the Food Bank at the Almonte Arena. If someone can understand the logic behind this lineup at this venue, please call The Charlatan at 788-6680.

54-40, The Waltons, The Arrogant Worms and The Barstool Prophets all play the Congress Centre. It's brought to you by the good folks at the University of Ottawa, the same people that didn't bring you Chris Rock. Tickets are $10 for students through Ticketmaster. Show starts at 7 p.m.

(Sure it does. The Sloan show put on by the U of O was also supposed to start at seven but they didn't let us in until eight. Actually, for all it mattered, they should've just locked the doors until Sloan took the stage after 11. Who had the brilliant idea of getting Sloan, one of the biggest underground acts in Canada, to play a cafeteria? Sloan was pretty cool, overcoming bad sound in a bad room, but Thrush Hermit is a pale Sloan clone, Kif Kif played bad, clichéd '70s heavy rock, and Tongues and Bones put on the worst show I've ever seen them play. — ed.)

Saturday, September 18

The Old Sod Folk Music Society of Ottawa presents The Friends of Fiddler's Green at the Glebe Community Centre. Music, storytelling and more fun than an Up With People show. Tickets are $12 for members of the Old Sod, $14 for everyone else.

Acid Test brings cool dance sounds to Zaphod's. Opening is Vancouver's Rymes With Orange (see interview, page 30). Cover is $6.

Sunday, September 19

Gypsy Soul do the "high energy funk'n'soul" type thing. They're at The Pit (underneath On Tap) tonight.

Monday, September 20

This week's book suggestion is John Ralston Saul's work Voltaire's Bastards. Anyone wanting to make sense of the world should read this tome.

Tuesday, September 21

You're on your own, folks.

Wednesday, September 22

Listen to your radio. On CKCU's In a

Mellow Tone at 9 p.m., Charles Skeete profiles jazz singer Joe Williams.

Or go see Lucky Ron, Ottawa's very own country legend, at Creeque Alley (recommended by Charlatan photo editor Tim O'Connor).

Thursday, September 23

Love violence? Don't see nearly enough callous murders these days? Then check out Reservoir Dogs at the Mayfair at 7 p.m. Not recommended for Up With People fans.

If you've got a listing you want to appear in this handy calendar, drop us a line at Room 531 Unicentre during regular office hours or fax us at 788-4051. Listings must be in by the Friday before publication.

MacOdrum library forgives and forgets

by Andrea Wiebe
Charlatan Staff

Carleton's library will walk softly this week, but will start carrying a big stick next week.

The library is having an amnesty week from Sept. 23 to Sept. 30. During this time, borrowers may return overdue material without being fined.

But the library is introducing a stricter sanctions policy which will go into effect Oct. 1.

Under the new policy, borrowers with three or more overdue items, like books or instructional television tapes, will have their borrowing privileges suspended until all overdue materials are returned.

Linda Rossman, the library's associate librarian, says long-overdue material is the main reason for having an amnesty week. She says students who put off returning their overdue materials "greatly inconvenience other users who are waiting for that book to come back . . . It becomes very unfair."

Rossman says between 1,500 and 2,000 books are either overdue or lost right now, and at least 40 instructional television tapes are overdue.

Rossman says if the sanctions policy was now in place, 165 people would have had their borrowing privileges suspended already.

Gary Anandasangaree, CUSA's director of academics, says he thinks the amnesty week will save students money.

He says the new sanctions policy can also help students "by getting books back that have been out for a long time, because they're books that students need."

Allison Cederholm, a second-year English student, says she's not sure about the new library policy.

"I would like other students to bring back their books because if I need them I'd like them to be there when they're supposed to be."

"But on the other hand, I know how they feel because I do have overdue books, and sometimes you just don't realize that they are overdue," she says.

and approved the new sanctions last spring, says professor Ian Cameron, the committee's chair. Cameron says the new sanctions are "a way to use something other than fines to get books that are not circulating."

He says the sanctions will also apply to all faculty members. Cameron says faculty and students are often willing to pay the fines in order to keep the books, but if their borrowing privileges are suspended, they are likely to renew the books instead.

The idea for the new sanctions policy came from the library staff, says university librarian David Holmes, a member of the senate library committee.

The committee, made up of students and faculty members, plays an advisory role when any change in library policy will affect the Carleton community at large.

Holmes says the committee, "felt there was a need for a tougher policy to get the books back on time and to keep them moving."

Rossman says she hopes for a good response to the amnesty. The last amnesty period was about 20 years ago. Though the amnesty week may reduce revenue generated by library fines, Rossman says this is not the library's primary concern.

Summer assaults leave postering questions

by Prema Oza
Charlatan Staff

A safety poster about two summer incidents in residence was not distributed quickly enough and should have been posted all over campus, say three service co-ordinators for the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA).

On Aug. 10, a woman living in residence woke up to discover a male intruder in her room who left without a word. On Aug. 15, another female resident was taking a shower when a man entered through her unlocked room door, exposed himself and indecently touched her.

Both incidents were reported to the department of university safety. A poster publicizing the incidents was issued Aug. 16 and posted around residence.

Ehab Shanti, co-ordinator of the International Students' Centre, and Renée Twaddle, co-ordinator of the Carleton Women's Centre, say that if a poster had been circulated sooner about the first incident, the second one might have been avoided.

Shanti says he was approached by the woman involved in the Aug. 10 incident, who was an international student. He then contacted Twaddle and Foot Patrol co-ordinator Brenda Kennedy.

CUSA President Lucy Watson says she's concerned the poster only went up in residence.

"Concern is not restricted just to residence students," says Watson.

Twaddle says the poster should have gone all over campus.

"If this incident happened in (the) Loeb (building) or the library, you wouldn't expect posters to be put up just in Loeb or the library."

Nancy Adamson, co-ordinator for the university's status of women office, says the posters were distributed only in residence because "what was going on pertained only to residence."

Mark Tinlin, director of university safety, says when an incident occurs, a safety poster committee must consider if the incident is a threat to the entire campus and if the poster warrants wide distribution on campus.

The committee, which is made up of Tinlin, Adamson, Watson, and Pat O'Brien, director of public relations and information services, co-ordinates the production of safety posters.

Shanti says he believes the posters for the first incident were not made up at first because the issue was not considered to be serious enough.

Tinlin says there was "some discussion" about whether or not the first incident should be posterized.

"There is always a review of whether the poster is of value," says Tinlin.

The postering policy says the type of incidents to be reported on posters are sexual assaults, physical assaults, exhibitionism, voyeurism, hate incidents and "other situations determined by the safety poster committee to merit an announcement to the university community."

Heather Brown, associate director of public relations and information services, says she spoke to the department of university safety on Aug. 16 and found out about the incident in residence that occurred the day before. She says she then went to the printers and stopped them from printing the Aug. 10 poster.

"We thought that since both incidents were similar we would just incorporate it into one poster," says Brown.

"The (purpose of the) safety poster is to caution people about safety issues," says Brown. "It is an obvious precaution to lock your doors.

"In summer, residence is a different situation," she says, "it's like a hotel. Tour and conference services have people staying there. It's not just students. I think these are just judgments. People can agree or disagree."

Kennedy disagrees. Saying that keeping doors locked is an obvious precaution "puts the blame on the victim," she says.

Shanti says many international students are told by their parents that residence is the safest place on campus and many of them are not accustomed to locking their doors. He says the woman involved in the Aug. 10 incident has left Carleton because of the incident and is attending college elsewhere. □

Oliver's lineups revive a dead Rooster's

by José Bellemare
Charlatan Staff

People got to drink and wait instead of stand in line and wait to get into Oliver's on Sept. 15 — the first night the bar was open to the general public.

They were sent upstairs to Rooster's Coffeehouse with a ticket to wait about 20 minutes for their number to be called to get into Oliver's. Both places are owned and operated by the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA).

CUSA finance commissioner René Faucher says he decided to use this system on Wednesday nights when it's busy to avoid long lineups to get into the bar.

"When we saw the huge crowd on Wednesday the eighth (when the bar was open for a frosh-only event), we knew the 15th would be the same," he says.

"Instead of having students waiting in the hallway, they can wait in Rooster's."

Andrew Murison, a third-year Carleton student, says he liked the system.

"I think it's good because you don't have to stand in line," he says. "You can drink and wait instead of waiting in line."

Ron Goldson, a second-year Carleton student, says he felt confused when he was handed the ticket.

"I felt like they were giving me a goat check ticket," he says.

When Goldson had it all figured out, he had bitter words about the system.

"I thought it was another way for Rooster's to make more money instead of people leaving to another bar," he says.

Faucher says he regretted students didn't know about the system beforehand.

"There were a few people surprised but they were also equally surprised the line moved rather quickly," he says. "Students would've had to wait an hour and a half in line."

But the problem wasn't completely solved because students had to stand in line to get into Rooster's.

"When people wait in line for Rooster's, that's when they get upset," says Faucher.

He says CUSA will make the wait more pleasurable in Rooster's by setting up more music with a DJ and clearing some of the tables and chairs so students can dance.

He also says he will arrange to have more employees working behind the bar at Rooster's so the wait for drinks won't be long.

Despite the number system, Faucher says there was some mischief going on in Rooster's.

"There was a lot of people bartering for tickets."

He says he heard a student offering to buy a ticket for $10 to jump the queue, even though tickets were free.

Faucher says the night brought in a gross revenue of $23,000 for both Rooster's and Oliver's liquor sales. He says Rooster's alone brought in over $6,000. Faucher says on a normal Wednesday night, Oliver's brings in about $10,000 and Rooster's about $1,000.

Nicole Gibson, an employee at Rooster's, says she loved it when all the students came into Rooster's that night.

"It was great," she says. "Oliver's steals all of the people Wednesday night. People didn't have to wait in line. I thought it was a pretty good system." □

CUSA budget: read this, it's your money

by Ryan Nakashima
Charlatan Staff

Just what has the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) done with my $80.40 undergraduate student fee?

This is a good question, since it's our $1.8 million in fees that make up most of CUSA's $2-million operating budget. CUSA council passed this budget at a council meeting on Aug. 11.

CUSA made a profit of $375,592 last year with total revenues of about $6.5 million and expenditures of about $6.2 million, says René Faucher, CUSA's finance commissioner.

The big savings came from not renovating the Unicentre, for which CUSA had budgeted $317,000, says Faucher. The maintenance would have involved extensive changes like replacing windows and repairing walls, says Stan Britton of physical plant.

Faucher says university administration was to finance half the project, but it pulled out last February because it lacked the funds.

This year's profit is going to be put into a "building Band-Aid fund," because the 20-year-old building is "falling apart," says Faucher.

CUSA's investment fund has about $400,000 in it this year after $340,000 was taken out for Oliver's renovations. Faucher says Oliver's will pay back the money without interest over seven years. CUSA's investments are in insured federal government treasury bills, provincial bonds and guaranteed investment certificates, says Faucher.

Oliver's bar lost about $100,000 last year, an amount Faucher says was made up in savings in other parts of the budget. For instance, CUSA saved $20,000 by cutting and freezing parts of CUSA's budget.

Even though Faucher has set the funding allocations with this budget, he says cuts may still happen, as they did last year in March, when CUSA services had their budgets frozen. The operating budget is "only a guideline," says Faucher.

"The only thing I care about is the bottom line. If that means cutting back in their areas (student services) during the year, I'll do that."

BREAKDOWN OF CUSA EXECUTIVE BUDGET

(The Charlatan looked at areas in the budget where there were changes from the previous year, or where it wasn't clear what the area covered. The first figure quoted for each budget line is the actual amount spent in 1992-93. The second figure is what has been budgeted for 1993-94).

President

Alumni Relations $402.00/$300.00

This fund pays for CUSA executive members to attend alumni dinners and fundraisers which can cost as much as $50 a plate. This summer, four CUSA executive members went to a summer event, costing $200.

Conferences $1,279.00/$3,000.00

This line increased for every executive member. Last year, all conferences were lumped into a discretionary category (a fund that required council's approval before being dipped into). This year, necessary conferences are in the operating budget and were sanctioned when CUSA council passed the budget. CUSA still has an $11,000 discretionary fund for students who want to go on conferences. Spending from this fund must be authorized by council.

Special Projects $14,023.29/$13,000.00

This covers "the whole portfolio of (the) president, except for fixed costs,

(and) is essentially what the person takes on as a pet project," says Faucher.

Two main expenses take up about $10,000 of this fund already — experience booklets to help first-year students in the transition to university, and an awards book, on reference, to make applying for awards and bursaries easier. Each costs about $5,000. The first-year booklets are available this year.

Finance Commissioner

Executive Honoraria $81,953.00/$99,000.00

CUSA's president and finance commissioner make $18,000 a year. The vice-presidents external and internal make $16,000 a year each. The director of academics and director of services make $15,500 a year.

Executive benefits covers the part of salaries paid for unemployment insurance, 14 per cent of their total salaries.

Honoraria and benefit totals have both increased this year because there is one more executive member than last year.

Executive Tuition $8,076.30/$8,200

Faucher says every executive member gets three credits paid for.

CUSA Taxi Chits $542/$500

Faucher says this line isn't for actual chits, but to reimburse students who present receipts for cab rides.

He says it's for people required to work late who are too far away to take buses. CUSA vice-president external Kristine Haselsteiner also gets $400 for taxi rides, as she often needs to be off-campus unexpectedly. CUSA's vice-president internal Rob Jamieson also has $150 for taxis.

Special Projects Fund $4,457.94/$4,000.00

Last year, much of Faucher's fund went to the Ravens 'R Us, a social club which promotes school spirit on campus. $2,000 went to making up 800 mugs for the members. Another $1,100 was spent on Ravens 'R Us events. Members who brought mugs to Oliver's Thursday nights got "something like a 20-cent discount" on beer, says Faucher.

He says the funding for the club was an incentive to get them to have their events in Oliver's and turn around the dead Thursday nights in the bar. Other clubs generally don't get this funding.

"The first event went well, we had about 500 people. Then it wasn't as well-organized later on," says Faucher.

On two or more Saturday nights, bands were brought to Oliver's at a cost of $300-$400 per night. DJs were also brought in at a cost of between $150 and $250 per night.

Faucher says these nights were generally successful. But during the final Ravens 'R Us night after Oliver's closed in March, "I think we had about 20 people show up," says Faucher. His special projects fund paid for DJ and staffing costs for the event.

Vice-President External

Environment Commissioner $4,532.55/$0.00

The commissioner's salary was paid for last year out of the federal government's Environmental Partners Fund. The government fund has been cut, so CUSA has budgeted for the environment commissioner under the director of services portion of the budget.

Lobby Days $17.50/$1,030.00

Last year, $1,800 was budgeted to lobby the federal and provincial governments on behalf of students. For example, Haselsteiner says she plans to lobby the Ontario government about the proposed 50 per cent tuition increase. The money goes to organizing rallies, advertisements and paying for buses to events. National Week of Action $866.88/$2,375.00

Last year, $2,927 was budgeted and only $867 was spent. This year's National Week of Action should happen in February. Haselsteiner says the week will deal with similar issues to lobby days. The budget also pays for buses to and from events such as National Student Day Oct. 13, which was cancelled last year because of a lack of interest.

"I guess students were happy with their federal (and) provincial governments," says Faucher.

Federal Election $0.00/$4,995.00

Faucher says this area is difficult to budget for since costs can't be predicted in advance. There is enough money set aside to lobby for student concerns so that Haselsteiner says she "will not be dipping into anyone else's budget line." The money will cover buses, advertisements, banners, and other unforeseen costs.

CUSA is organizing an all-candidates debate for the Ottawa Centre riding Sept. 28. CUSA is paying for advertising, staffing, and equipment.

Date Rape Campaign $900.27/$0.00

Last year the Canadian Federation of Students organized this campaign, sharing the cost with its members. CFS supplied posters, etc., but is not doing so this year. This year's campaign will be run by CUSA's service centres, and will be paid for out of their budgets.

Vice-President Internal

Staff Appreciation $4,255.04/$5,500.00

Jamieson says this should read "volunteer appreciation," instead of staff appreciation. It's for things like pizzas and pops as reimbursement for people who volunteer their time to the association. Last year $3,200 was budgeted.

Promotions $0.00/$6,205.00

This new line in the budget is to promote CUSA through public relations and advertising, making students aware of the services available.

Referendum $0.00/$1,500.00

Every year a referendum is budgeted for. This year, there will probably be a vote to pay for an anti-calendar (see director of academics' budget), and a referendum asking students how CFS should be funded. Jamieson says every year CUSA council sets a spending limit for referendum campaigns. Both the Yes and No committees for each referendum question get an amount of money, decided by council, to run their campaign. This covers the cost of posters. Jamieson says this is done "so there is no financial constraint in running a campaign, even if only one student is opposing a question." The referenda take place during CUSA elections.

Director of Academics

Course Evaluation Guide $0.00/$5,311.00 (total)

This is for the anti-calendar, a students' evaluation describing courses, workload, and teachers from the students' perspective. Director of academics Gary Anandasangaree says he will submit a referendum question for the CUSA

NUG rep cries foul over caucus chair

by Franco D'Orazio
Charlatan Staff

A representative from the New University Government (NUG) is accusing Carleton's undergraduate students' association of trying to take the organization over unconstitutionally.

The council of the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) approved a proposal last March which violates NUG's constitution as well as one of the association's own policy statements, says Corey Mulvihill, a NUG representative for the department of classics.

NUG is a group of about 150 students, each representing their respective field of study and year, who represent student concerns by sitting on department and faculty boards.

According to the minutes of a March 11 CUSA council meeting, councillors approved an amendment to the job description of CUSA's director of academics which made him the NUG chair.

Council's decision to endorse the proposal, which CUSA President Lucy Watson described at the meeting as "in the best interests of the students," violated an article in NUG's constitution which gives it sole authority over its composition, including its chair.

The councillors' decision also violated a CUSA policy statement enacted in April 1991, which states CUSA recognizes "that the NUG Student Caucus has sole authority over its . . . structure."

"CUSA has taken over NUG and put their people on it," says Mulvihill.

Gary Anandasangaree, the director of academics, says according to the CUSA constitution, NUG is autonomous, but CUSA provides it with financial support and office space.

During the previous three years, the NUG chair has been chosen by a hiring committee consisting of CUSA councillors, and the appointment must be endorsed by CUSA council.

Anandasangaree says this process has never been challenged and, though it is not part of either the CUSA or NUG constitution, it has been a tradition "for at least four years."

Watson says she knew the proposal was unconstitutional, "but I didn't think this was going to be a problem. I was following past practices," she says.

Mulvihill says the decision to choose

Anandasangaree as chair was made to appease the university administration.

"NUG is the only body on campus that agitates the university administration," says Mulvihill, "and CUSA would much rather keep their nose brown and shove it up their (administration's) asses."

"That sounds mature," says Watson. "I have no intention of keeping my nose brown."

Watson says she added the responsibility to the director of academic's other duties because last year the NUG chair rarely met with last year's CUSA vice-president academic.

"There was little contact between the two," says Watson, who was NUG chair last year. But now the director of academics can bring the concerns of the NUG caucus to CUSA council, she says.

Mulvihill says NUG's power to influence academic policies on campus has been weakened by making a CUSA executive the chair.

"NUG expresses ideas and criticizes the university," he says, "and CUSA provides services and runs a few bars. CUSA is there to provide services, not to agitate the university administration."

Watson doesn't see it the same way.

"This is just an interesting angle for a few individuals to attack a CUSA executive member," she says, alluding to the fact that Mulvihill is a friend of Wayne Ross, the Student Academic Action Bureau co-ordinator who is involved in a labor dispute with the CUSA executive.

"I find it interesting that (this complaint) wasn't brought up at the March 11 council meeting to make the necessary changes," Watson says.

According to the minutes, several councillors asked Watson about her proposal, but no one asked if it was unconstitutional.

One councillor who voted in favor of the proposal says he did not know whether it was valid or not because he had just been elected to council.

"It was my first meeting and I didn't know too much about it," says arts and social sciences representative Ryan Butt.

When asked if he thought the manner in which he was made NUG chair was valid, Anandasangaree responded, "perhaps not." But he declined to say whether he would voluntarily step down as NUG chair. □

Executive membership has its privileges

by Ryan Nakashima
Charlatan Staff

Gold rings, $80 agenda refills and cottage retreats are some of the expenses covered in the executive budgets of the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA).

Take CUSA finance commissioner René Faucher. On his finger is a $273 CUSA ring, on his desk a $210 Franklin day planner.

Each of the six CUSA executive members has the Franklin planner already. By the end of the year, they will all have the gold ring, which Faucher got last year during his previous term as finance commissioner.

Faucher says executive members are expected to pay for their own leather-bound cover out of their own pockets, by election in October asking students if they want to pay a levy of about 30 cents per half-credit (about $3 for full-time students), to have the anti-calendar made. The costs above are for gathering information and labor costs. Printing should cost $20,000 to $30,000 to create one for every student, which CUSA would get if students approved the levy.

Grad School Fair $0.00/$1,500.00

Anandasangaree says 10 other universities (so far) from around Canada will be coming to Carleton to publicize their grad schools Oct. 5 in Porter Hall—the same week as the Careers Fair happening Oct. 6 and 7. He says it gives students the option to stay in school since the economy is tough now. The $1,500 will pay for the rental of Porter Hall, advertising and refreshments, says Anandasangaree.

Academic Equity Commissioner $0.00/$770.00 (total)

The commissioner will examine curriculum to find ways it could better reflect all students. Anandasangaree says the commissioner will also lobby curriculum committees and faculty boards for changes. The academic equity commissioner has yet to be advertised for, nor have terms of reference yet been set. Anandasangaree says he expects one to be hired in mid-October.

Director of Services Sensitivity Commissioner $0.00/$750.00

(With files from Maurice G. Fortier)

although not all have done so yet. The covers cost $130 each.

The $80 starter fillers, which include agenda pages and plastic dividers, are covered under the office supplies budget. Refill pages cost $25 for a new year.

Faucher says the rings are paid for out of the president's special projects fund. CUSA's director of academics, Gary Anandasangaree, has the leather-bound Franklin. "I know I didn't pay for mine," he says. "But whether it will be deducted from my salary, I don't know."

Of the rings, Anandasangaree says, "what the ring signifies to me is an acknowledgement of the work I've done. Sentimentally, there's a lot of value in that ring. It does have a lot of value that cannot be counted by money."

Not every executive member is thrilled about the day planners or the rings. CUSA director of services Theresa Cowan says she could do without the rings.

"I don't think that (the ring) is necessary. I wouldn't be upset if I didn't get one," says Cowan. "But it's a nice gesture because we do work very hard."

She says the Franklin's prices are "a bit exorbitant" and that although executive members need something to help them plan, it doesn't necessarily have to be a Franklin.

The Franklin day planners have day-by-day agenda pages and pockets in the cover. The planners also come with a book on how to use the planner and organize one's life effectively.

CUSA President Lucy Watson says the rings are a "tradition," and a "memento that's not equal to the amount of work" they do.

The president and finance commissioner each make $18,000 a year, the two vice-presidents make $16,000 each and the two directors make $15,500 each.

Watson says it's a worthwhile gift for executive members who are leaving CUSA, thanking them for their work.

Eight full-time CUSA staff have Franklins. CUSA covered the cost of refill pages for each planner but no new covers were bought for staff. In all, 14 CUSA employees have a Franklin planner.

The executives aren't likely to spend their allotted $1,000 on an executive retreat this year, says Faucher.

"Some of them have been disasters," he says.

"It's one thing to get into a debate when you're in your office, where you just go home after work. It's another thing to get into a heated debate or get angry over an issue when you're stuck in a cottage for a weekend."

The last executive spent $664 on a cottage retreat near Ste. Jovite, Que., in May, 1992. If any retreat happens this year, says Faucher, it'll happen this month.

Watson says the executives often work seven days a week, and don't get a chance to meet. She says the retreat is a way to see what's been done and organize what's to come.

Jamieson says he hopes the $1,000 will be spent this year because "(the Scotiabank only place to sock your loot

by Tanya Workman
Charlatan Staff

Students shopping around for a place to keep their money must leave campus to explore the options.

The Scotiabank in Paterson Hall is Carleton's only bank and that isn't likely to change soon.

Carleton Scotiabank manager Don Bailey says past leases with Carleton stipulated that it be the only bank on campus.

Its current lease comes up for renewal in July 1994, and Bailey says if the university wanted to, it could choose not to renew.

Scotiabank, which has been the university's banker since 1942, opened its campus branch in 1959. The bank's leases with the university run an average of five years.

Don McEown, executive assistant to Carleton President Robin Farquhar, says the university considered putting another bank on campus in past years, "but there isn't enough business for two banks. Students, as business for banks, aren't a high revenue producer."

Bailey doesn't think it is likely the university would consider the possibility again.

"If there were a couple of other banks on campus it wouldn't be worth our while," Bailey says. "We're giving the students their banking, but we make our funds elsewhere."

For students who care to venture off campus to pursue a banking package, there are a couple of banks that offer student packages.

Banking policies and student packages are the same at the campus

Scotiabank as its other branches in the city. Other major banks have comparable policies, but none are without their strings.

Holds on cheques are the one thing most banks, including Scotiabank, fail to mention when they advertise their student packages.

Personal cheques deposited in personal accounts at Scotiabank, TD Bank and the Bank of Montreal face holds of three to 10 business days, depending on the bank and where the cheque was written.

Five business days is the normal hold period for personal cheques deposited in all accounts, including those of students, at any Ottawa Scotiabank; a hold of up to 10 business days is the norm for cheques from small banks or from across the country.

The Bank of Montreal holds most customers' personal cheques, including those deposited by students, for an average of six business days. The bank's senior customer service representative says there is a reason.

"We have no way of knowing what sort of individual has issued the cheque," says Pat Bauder. "They may have $2 student clientele and "take a calculated risk so that students are able to pay their tuition, buy their books and cover their immediate expenses," says Bailey.

"Once we get into late October we revert back to the harder line."

The Scotiabank student package includes no service fees, a free chequing account, unlimited bank-machine use and a $1 charge per Interac transaction. But a $500 Visa card limit can be part of the package only if the student has a part-time job and credit is approved.

Service charges can't be avoided at the other banks.

For $2.50 per month, students who use the Toronto Dominion bank get no-charge withdrawals and deposits, two free Interac transactions and two free cheques per month, and a Visa card with a $500 limit, subject to credit approval.

Students can expect five-day holds on personal cheques and a seven-day hold on any cheque deposited in a bank machine.

The Bank of Montreal is the only other major bank with a student banking package. Unlimited use of Instabank machines, unlimited cheques and withdrawals and two free Interac transactions are available for $2.75 per month. Mastercard applications are subject to credit approval.

The Scotiabank has Cashstop machines in Residence Commons, the Unicentre and Paterson Hall. Students have access to other banks through Interac but all bank machines on campus belong to Scotiabank.

The University of Ottawa and Algonquin College don't have banks on their campuses. □

Student loan slowdowns

by C.D. LeBlanc
Charlatan Staff

WHY ARE THERE ONLY TWO PEOPLE PROCESSING THE OSAP LOANS AT THE SCOTIABANK ON CAMPUS?

So I'm sitting at the front of the line to pick up loans, in which I've just spent THREE AND A HALF HOURS. Most of that time was passed by bonding with my fellow recipients, griping about the lineup.

It was finally my turn in the spotlight — 10 minutes and I'd be gone, free until January when I'd have to repeat the process for my other loan.

Maybe it was the great feeling of relief I felt, or maybe it was the hushed complaints I still heard behind me. Either way, something drove me to ask the question that preyed upon my mind: "Um, why do they only have two people out here handling all these loans?"

To which a woman processing loans replied, "Because no one has complained."

It seemed unbelievable that no one had ever asked why only two bank employees were on hand outside the Scotiabank office in Paterson Hall last week to process loans. So I set out to discover why.

"I guess the biggest problem is the volume," says Don Bailey, the bank's manager.

"We are concentrating solely on the students," says student loan officer Bev Dillabough, adding she has had little time to do anything else but process loans.

She says the number of recipients has risen from an average of 100 people per day last year, to about 150 per day this year. The bank has been processing loans since Sept. 7.

Because of cuts to grants, "almost 95 per cent of students have two loans," says Dillabough, referring to the Canada Student Loan and the Ontario Student Loan. She says this doubles the amount of paperwork which has to be done for each student.

The rush lasts for about the first week of classes, says Bailey. He says the bank has "ongoing space problems," which slow things down too.

He says the bank is negotiating with the university to move to a bigger space, but nothing is available right now.

Dillabough says staff members are working overtime to clear the lines and complete the paperwork needed to place the money in students' accounts. □

Woman assaulted crossing train tracks

by Charlatan Staff

A woman crossing railway tracks on campus, while going from the Unicentre to the physical recreation centre, was violently pushed from behind at around 1:30 p.m. on Sept. 16.

The woman was not seriously injured by her unknown assailant.

Len Boudreau, assistant director of the department of university safety, says the incident is currently under investigation. □

Students don't get as much as they give

by Franco D'Orazio
Charlatan Staff

Carleton students will add to the university's coffers $5.25 million more in tuition fees this year than last.

But the university will increase its contribution for student aid by only $61,000, according to its 1993-94 budget.

The budget, approved by Carleton's board of governors April 27, includes a seven-per-cent increase in tuition fees for this year.

The board voted March 29 to increase tuition fees by seven per cent, the maximum increase allowed by the provincial government. At that meeting, the board rejected a proposal from student representatives to increase tuition fees by only three per cent.

The higher fees, coupled with an anticipated enrolment increase of 600 students this fall, will generate $44.7 million in income from tuition this year, 13 per cent more than last year's total of $39.5 million, according to the budget.

Funding for student aid, however, will rise by only two per cent to $3.1 million from $3.04 million, a figure that does not please Lucy Watson, president of the undergraduate students' association.

"It ($61,000) is a very tiny amount of what we pay in fees," she said. "(Student aid) is used to appease students. But I've sat on committees and students cannot afford any more fee increases."

Student aid includes undergraduate scholarships and bursaries, as well as loans given to students in need by the university.

Bill Pickett, the university's director of budget planning, said without the seven-per-cent tuition increase, Carleton's $4.3 million debt would triple within five years because it would have to borrow more money to pay for its expenses.

"It's not too much magic," he said in an interview earlier this summer.

"Every dollar you borrow is a dollar more on the deficit. These things pile up."

Pickett explained the increase was necessary because of stagnant provincial funding and resources already stretched to the limit.

"There is no other area to cut from," he said.

The $5.25 million will account for 55 per cent of the $9.5 million in new income Carleton will generate this year.

The university will also receive $755,000 more in government grants from the Ontario government, a one-per-cent increase from last year's total of $100.24 million.

The university expects to generate $35.48 million in ancillary fees, $2.4 million more than last year. These fees include extra charges for parking permits, locker rentals and late registration.

Carleton also expects to generate $22.5 million in research, $1 million more than last year.

Marion Dewar, vice-chair of the board's personnel committee, said raising tuition fees every year amounts to "discouraging youngsters from coming to university."

Carleton has raised its tuition fees by 23 per cent over the last three years.

Dewar says she is concerned cash-strapped students will end up spending all their time worrying about bills instead of books.

"They should be spending more time on campus," she said. "But if they're working at part-time jobs, they will never stimulate their brains."

Carleton administered more than $34 million in financial aid and awards programs last year, $31.9 million of which was from provincial and federal government loan programs.

Including this year, monies generated from tuition at Carleton will have increased 43 per cent in the last three fiscal years to $44.7 million from $31.3 million.

The university's contribution to student aid during the same time will have increased by 22 per cent, rising to $3.1 million from $2.5 million. □

Why is Mike's Place Pub Mike's Place?

by Anne Showalter
Charlatan Staff

Because Lester's Place didn't sound right.

Ron Boyd, manager of Mike's Place, says every former chancellor of Carleton University has something named after them: the Tory building, the Steacie building, Paterson Hall.

The only chancellor who was not given a building in his name is Canada's former prime minister Lester B. Pearson, says Boyd.

Mike's Place used to generically be called the Graduate Students' Pub or Bar, says Andrew Prime, the assistant manager of Mike's.

Prime says the bar was renamed in 1973 after Pearson died of cancer on Dec. 27, 1972. Pearson was Carleton's chancellor when he died and had been since 1969.

But wait. How can Mike's Place be named after someone named Lester? Goodpoint. And it turns out, your guess may be as good as ours.

According to the Encyclopedia Canadiana, Lester B. Pearson was nicknamed Mike while he was a student at Oxford University. He felt Lester was not a strong enough name. Obviously, it did not hold him back in government.

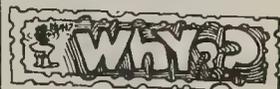

In a similar vein, John Robinson Beal writes in Pearson of Canada that "It was when he transferred to the Royal Flying Corps that he picked up the nickname 'Mike.'"

According to Beal, when Pearson went for flying instruction, a senior officer remarked "Lester — that's not a very belligerent name for a man who wants to be a fighter pilot. We'll call you Mike."

And, straight from the horse's mouth (Pearson's memoirs) comes this reference to the pseudonym Michael Macdonald, which Pearson writes that he "used for (his) wireless reports to Canada during the Battle of Britain."

Any other theories? Anyway, Mike's Place, on the second floor of the Unicentre, is a small pub run by the Graduate Students' Association — but you don't need a degree to get in the door.

Boyd says students and professors go to Mike's Place to be treated equally no matter who they are, where they're from or how popular they are. □

Carleton drops out of Maclean's survey

by Christina Craft
Charlatan Staff

Carleton will not participate in this year's annual Maclean's magazine survey which ranks Canadian universities.

In a press release issued Sept. 16, the university cited a lack of staff resources needed to update the information for the Maclean's survey.

Carleton President Robin Farquhar said two professional staff worked almost full time in the summer of 1992 to fulfil Maclean's requirements for last year's survey. The university spent about $100,000 collecting the data and organizing it according to the requirements of the survey.

"I'm not going to be bullied around by some magazine in Toronto against the better interests of this university," Farquhar told The Charlatan.

Farquhar said although the Maclean's survey is changing little from last year, updating the information would require the same amount of time and effort.

Carleton does not have statistics compiled which could be easily tailored to suit the Maclean's survey, said Bill Pickett, director of the office of budget planning. "We had to collect and massage data," said Pickett.

Pickett didn't comment on how much money was spent to compile information for the 1991 survey, but he said it was poorly done.

Farquhar said Carleton will instead be using its institutional research staff to conduct an internal study of student satisfaction with the university. He said the study is in the planning stages and he does not know when it will be finished or how much it will cost.

Farquhar said an internal study would be just as useful as the Maclean's survey. He said the study will be made public and will be more relevant than the magazine's ranking system.

Ann Dowsett Johnston, assistant managing editor of Maclean's, said she is disappointed with Carleton's decision.

She said other Ontario universities are faced with the same financial constraints as Carleton but are still participating. "Maclean's is the only vehicle to reach a broader audience," said Dowsett Johnston. Last year the magazine sold over 63,000 copies of its university survey issue.

She said students have a right to comprehensive information when choosing a university.

"Where public institutions are concerned, it is a David and Goliath thing. Someone has to make them accountable," she said.

There are only two other universities in Canada not participating in this year's survey — Memorial University in St. John's, Nfld., and University of Quebec's Montreal campus. Maclean's said Memorial does not agree with the methodology of the survey.

Two of the universities who declined to participate last year, University College of Cape Breton and the Montreal campus of the University of Quebec, were ranked last in their categories.

Dowsett Johnston said Maclean's has not made a decision if they will rank universities who did not participate in this year's process.

When the first survey came out in 1991, every university in Canada was ranked together. Carleton placed 44th out of 46 universities who participated.

The 1991 ranking caused a wave of controversy at Carleton because administration sent incorrect information to Maclean's.

Figures on the number of full-time arts and science faculty, the percentage of PhDs, undergraduate scholarships and the amount of research grants were all submitted incorrectly.

For instance, the value of research grants was incorrectly given to Maclean's as over $1.6 million, while the correct number was close to $8 million.

Dennis Forcese, then the vice-president academic, resigned following a report which placed him with the responsibility of collecting and sending the faulty data to Maclean's.

Following harsh criticism from some universities including Carleton about the survey's criteria and methodology, Maclean's changed its approach for the 1992 survey.

Universities were ranked within three categories according to their size and programs. Maclean's used 22 indicators to rate schools, including entrance requirements, qualifications of the faculty, scholarships and budgets. In 1992, Carleton placed sixth out of the 12 universities in the "comprehensive universities" category.

"People would think we were crying sour grapes if we did not participate last year," said Farquhar. "This year we are in a much more graceful position not to be included."

The 1993 survey will be very similar to last year's, says Dowsett Johnston. She said the survey tried to accommodate universities' concerns about criteria for ranking.

A three-hour meeting was held between the magazine and Farquhar this summer, said Dowsett Johnston. She said Maclean's did their best to address Carleton's concerns.

However, she said no representatives from Carleton showed up to meetings held this summer between the Council of Ontario Universities and Maclean's to discuss the survey. □

Survey says: students mixed on Maclean's

Carleton's decision not to participate in the upcoming Maclean's survey may or may not affect how the university is perceived, depending on who you talk to.

Applications actually increased over the last two years despite Carleton's low ranking in 1991, says President Robin Farquhar.

This year, the number of high-school applicants to Carleton increased to 11,995 from 10,776, according to the university's office of budget planning.

Joan Hollingsworth, a fourth-year political science student, says the Maclean's survey isn't important.

"I don't think high-school students put much weight on the survey. When I was applying to university I was more into the work of the faculty and I found Carleton has a superior faculty," she says.

Daena Bilodeau, a first-year student at Carleton, says her summer boss asked her why she would want to go to Carleton with its low rating in the Maclean's survey. But she said she still feels Carleton should participate in the process, "because it gives students an idea of what a university is like."

Farquhar says the survey isn't valid.

Sonia Charbonneau, also a first-year student, says her high-school teachers showed students the survey last year. She says she disagrees with Carleton dropping out because she thinks the ranking is useful.

Farquhar says he isn't sure if high-school students know how flawed the survey is. "You cannot possibly take an entire university and boil it down to one number. Methodologically, it is not valid."

Aaron Goldstein, a fourth-year Carleton political science student, agrees with Carleton's decision. "Our limited resources can be better spent in other directions... There is not a lot of merit in the survey."

Lori Berketa, a guidance technician at Confederation high school in Nepean, says she tells students that no university is a bad university.

"We didn't find (the survey) important. It is not a big concern."

She says it is important to choose a school for its atmosphere and programs.

An editorial in the Ottawa Citizen on Sept. 17 says Carleton's decision not to participate in the Maclean's survey suggests "wrong-headed defeatism."

The editorial concludes, "... by dropping out of the national survey, the university looks like a disappointed spoilsport."

Farquhar says he was not surprised by the editorial, just disappointed. He calls the editorial "extremely biased."

He says Carleton is braver for not participating because it is going against the flow. □

Ontario universities report more applications

by David T. Cole
Brook Press, Brook University

Faced with a small and competitive job market, high-school students are flocking to Ontario universities in record numbers.

As well, Carleton has seen greater numbers of students admitted to and confirmed as attending the university this year.

There were 58,212 applications for 48,000 first-year positions at universities in Ontario, according to the Ontario University Application Centre.

This is about 1,200 more than last year, says the centre's director Greg Marcotte.

"There are a lot of desperate students out there," says Marcotte. "I'm getting calls from parents. There's no doubt that hundreds of kids with A averages were disappointed this year."

With so many students applying for university, the entrance requirements for acceptance to university are rising, says Marcotte.

The application centre reports many high-school students took up to 11 Ontario Academic Courses, or Grade 13 classes, (only six are required) or repeated courses to obtain a higher mark to increase their odds at acceptance.

At Carleton this year, the number of students who applied to first year from Ontario high schools increased to 11,995 from 10,776 last year, says Bill Pickett, director of the office of budget planning.

The number of Carleton students admitted to first year increased 11 per cent in September 1993, to 6,490 from 5,849 in 1992.

First-year students who confirmed that they will attend Carleton this year numbered 4,034 as of August 1993. This is up 13.7 per cent from last year's confirmations of 3,547. □

Ottawa students part of anti-racism protest

by Pat Brethour
Charlatan Staff

Ottawa anti-racism groups travelled to Montreal on Sept. 22 to join a coalition of 50 groups in protesting the visit of three right-wing politicians from France.

Violence was not expected at the protest, despite the groups' plans to confront neo-Nazi organizations which they expect will use the visit as a rallying point.

But Ottawa's Anti-Racist Action and the International Socialists said they would be ready for any clashes which might occur. The demonstration's outcome was not known before The Charlatan went to press.

The International Socialists -- who chartered a bus from Ottawa so people could attend the protest -- said they were not anticipating any fights with neo-Nazi groups. Organizers expected over 5,000 people at the Berri Park protest in downtown Montreal.

"I don't expect it to be violent at all," said Warren McPherson, third-year Carleton student and International Socialist member, before travelling to Montreal.

"The anti-racists and socialists won't instigate violence. It's always the fascists that instigate violence."

Jean-Yves Le Gallou, Pascal Delmas and Jacques Doré are French municipal politicians -- and are also members of the extreme right-wing party Front National.

The three are part of a delegation to the Metropolis '93 conference on urban issues which is being held in Montreal the week of Sept. 22.

Although the trio are permitted to attend the conference, Montreal Mayor Jean Doré said they weren't invited to a Sept. 22 reception at city hall.

Deporting North African immigrants and discriminating against them in the areas of employment, housing and social services, is only part of the Front National's racist agenda, said McPherson.

The Front National has 100,000 members and received over 3 million votes (but no seats) in France's 1993 legislative elections.

Jean-Marie Le Pen, the Front's leader, once said the Holocaust was a "minor detail of history."

McPherson said he did not know if Le Pen would visit Montreal during the conference.

"We can't actually say Le Pen is coming because he doesn't announce his travel plans more than 24 hours ahead of time," said McPherson.

He said the presence of the Front National politicians -- even if Le Pen did not make an appearance -- would serve as a rallying point for white supremacists like the Toronto-based Heritage Front.

"I don't imagine they are coming to sightsee," said Sarah Dore, an Anti-Racist Action member who is also a University of Ottawa student.

Representatives from Anti-Racist Action said violence was "quite possible" but the demonstration itself would be peaceful.

"We do not believe in violence, but we do believe in self-defense," said Dore.

Anti-Racist Action is an international grassroots human rights group which sometimes uses violent tactics against white supremacist groups.

"If we are attacked, we are not going to say 'Stop, or I'll say stop again'," Dore said.

Anti-Racist Action will "do what we can do to stop Le Pen and groups like the Heritage Front (from) gaining any significant foothold in the community" she said.

If not a foothold, racist groups do have a toehold in Montreal.

A Rock for Racism concert the night of the protest had the potential to put large numbers of neo-Nazis and anti-racists out on the streets together. Whether that combination will lead to violence is far from sure.

An Aug. 14 anti-racist rally in Montreal by 700 people was undisturbed by violence. But at a similar Ottawa rally on May 29, Anti-Racist Action battled with members of the Heritage Front.

But McPherson said he believes the large numbers of anti-racist protesters expected this time around would ensure their safety.

"If the numbers were even, I don't think we'd march right up to them," he said.

Even with the possibility of violence, said McPherson, the protest has to go on.

"What's important right now is to stop the fascists," he said. "If you don't confront them, it doesn't stop them." □

Charest talks politics to Carleton students

by Brent Dowdall
Charlatan Staff

Deputy prime minister Jean Charest visited a class at Carleton Sept. 14, telling students not to be cynical about politics and politicians.

"It's a grave error to be cynical," said Charest to about 250 students in professor George Roseme's political science 100 class.

"Being cynical means you've given up, and that you're leaving it to someone else, which at your age is terrible," said Charest. "I've had my ups and I've had my downs, but I believe in politics today as much as the very first day."

Charest got several rounds of applause from the class, despite spilling coffee on himself. He spoke for about twenty minutes before fielding questions from the class.

Roseme said he got the request for the deputy prime minister's appearance from a member of Charest's "entourage," who is a former student of Roseme's.

However, some students told The Charlatan afterwards they were not impressed with Charest's performance.

"He's a nice guy but I wouldn't vote for his party," said one student.

"He was supposed to talk about politics and what happens in politics, but instead he talked about himself and his party," said another student.

Roseme said his guest speaker was successful in increasing class interest.

Charest schmoozed with Carleton poli-sci students.

"Usually after the course introductions, I try to stir up the class's interest and usually fail, so I brought in the deputy prime minister to do the job," he said. "I wasn't promoting any candidate. I saw him as a specimen of the political animal."

During a question and answer period, one student asked Charest what he would say to young people voting for the first time.

"Unless people go out there and make their choice, people are going to make that choice for them. That's what the democratic process is all about," Charest replied.

However, he also said politicians have to work harder to be more responsible.

"The people who are most critical about the political system are the politicians themselves," Charest said. "If we're going to ask citizens to support us then we have to start being a lot more responsible ourselves."

One student asked why voters should vote for Charest's Conservative party.

"We feel the election is about leadership on jobs and the economy," Charest told the student.

Charest repeated the Conservatives' campaign platform themes, including deficit and debt reduction, helping small business, more emphasis on training and education, research and development and trade issues.

"It's no coincidence that in the past nine years why our government has been so preoccupied with trade issues. Trade is critical, not only to the overall economy but to jobs," he said.

After the class, some students surrounded Charest to talk to him, while other students talked to Ottawa Centre Tory candidate Ian Lee, who is also an assistant business professor at Carleton. Not surprisingly, Lee said Charest's performance was "excellent".

"Mr. Charest connects and resonates with young people," said Lee.

When asked about the Conservative education record by The Charlatan, Charest said transfer payments to universities have been increased on average of 5.1 per cent per year from 1984-85 to 1990-91. □

Fun Farquhar Fact

... everything you wanted to know about Sparky but were afraid to ask.

by David Bartolf
Charlatan Staff

Carleton's venerable President Robin H. Farquhar has announced that the university administration will send no information to Maclean's magazine for its third survey of Canadian universities.

It seems he wants to prevent another public skewering, like Carleton's 1991 ranking of 44 out of 46 universities.

Looks like administration decided not to spend money, like last year, on a number-crunching committee to jig the stats to assure high placement.

As our good man Sparky well knows, from his background as a member and former president of the Canadian Society for the Study of Education, that once again Maclean's is using irrelevant figures like student-teacher ratios.

Instead, Maclean's should be looking at the following criteria, which would have incidentally pushed Carleton up to number one:

10. Wildlife population, including those lovable, huggable res rats.

9. Per capita alcohol consumption.

8. Daily frequency with which "essay, schmessay" is articulated.

7. Percentage of student population wearing underwear over long-johns to the res cafeteria.

6. Percentage of student population that flips channels between their ITV class and Young and the Restless or Snelgrove Snail.

5. Number of out-of-town students sick and tired of relatives or co-workers telling you to "straighten out that damn Mulroney," as if you and he brunch together all the time.

4. Number of times Rainbowhead or that guy who holds the John 3:16 sign shows up in ITV tapes. (Look for them. It's more fun than Where's Waldo?)

3. Money spent to date trying to impress Maclean's.

2. Number of oxygen-free buildings on campus.

1. Two words: Elvis sightings. □

CUSA seeks enumeration booth for CU

by Michael Mainville
Charlatan Staff

Efforts to establish an on-campus enumeration booth for the upcoming federal election have been frustrated by the Elections Canada office for Ottawa Centre.

Kristine Haselsteiner, vice-president external of the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA), says "having an enumeration booth on campus would make it significantly easier for students to vote."

The booth would register Carleton students to vote Oct. 25 in the Ottawa Centre riding.

Haselsteiner says although she has been trying since mid-summer to have the booth set up, she has had no success so far.

As yet, Haselsteiner has not convinced the Elections Canada returning officer for Ottawa Centre, Marjory Hamson, to provide this service for Carleton students.

"The returning officer does not want to have an enumeration," Haselsteiner says.

Theresa Little, assistant to the returning officer for Ottawa Centre says, "an enumeration booth is just not feasible."

She says the booth is not necessary because off-campus Carleton students can register through the mail to vote in Ottawa or in their home riding. As well, students can register at the polls on Oct. 25 to vote in the local riding of their university.

Little says Elections Canada is providing a door-to-door enumeration service for all residence students, which began on Sept. 20 and runs until Sept. 23. It also set up an information booth for students on Sept. 21 and 22 in Baker Lounge.

However, Haselsteiner says this is not enough for Carleton students.

"I feel that they are being neglected by the democratic process, specifically by the returning officer for Ottawa Centre."

Hamson says Haselsteiner doesn't realize that an enumeration booth for the Carleton campus is a dead issue.

"Little Miss Kristine does not respect legislative directives and does not respect the duly appointed officer for the Ottawa riding," Hamson says.

Under the Elections Act, a new enumeration for this election isn't required, since one was done for last October's federal constitutional referendum.

Haselsteiner says she resorted to calling some local candidates in the beginning of September and asked them to speak to Hamson on her behalf.

While the appeals by the candidates to Hamson had no effect, Haselsteiner says she persisted in her demands for the booth.

Without a normal enumeration, some students may be confused about where and how to vote.

For most first-year students of voting age, the upcoming federal election will be their first chance to participate in the electoral process.

"I have no idea on how to vote, where to vote, who to ask about voting and I don't know who is running in this riding," says Billy Mintsopoulos, a first-year arts student.

As well, students who are away from their normal residence must decide whether they want to vote in Ottawa Centre or their home riding.

During last October's federal referendum, Elections Canada organized a large student awareness campaign called Voting's a Breeze.

But even though every eligible voter was enumerated for last year's vote, Hamson says no enumeration booth was set up on campus last year. Students were enumerated at their residence, either off campus or on.

Haselsteiner says the prospect of getting an enumeration booth on campus "seems pretty hopeless."

Instead, Haselsteiner says she is seeking to organize campaign telling students how to get enumerated. "We will do our best to make sure students are informed and enumerated." □

"I feel that they (students) are being neglected by the democratic process, specifically by the returning officer for Ottawa Centre." --Haselsteiner books coming back, since we don't keep the fines anyway," says Rossman.

The new sanctions policy may also decrease revenue, she says, since borrowing privileges will be suspended, resulting in fewer overdue materials.

Library fines are collected as part of the university's general revenue. Last year, the total revenue generated from library fines was $342,000 — two tenths of a per cent of the university's total $145-million revenue for the year ending April 30, 1993.

In the 1992-93 school year, the library collected $163,000 in fines at the service desk, an increase of 8.5 per cent from the previous year. This figure does not include the fines that were paid at the business office.

If students wait over six weeks to pay fines, they are charged a $65 replacement fee, plus the $20 maximum fine, plus another $10 administration fee, which they must pay at the business office. □

Admin. zips lip

We cannot see into the minds of Carleton University's administrators, so we may never know what really motivated them to drop out of the Maclean's magazine annual ranking of Canadian universities.

But, from the outside, Carleton is beginning to look like a paranoid institution, hiding statistics and secrets with Soviet-like efficiency.

President Robin Farquhar says the staff resources allotted to compiling figures for the survey would be better used to conduct an internal survey of Carleton's performance.

Could it be that administration wants to be in full control of the way data is released by its bureaucrats? Is the fear of bad publicity so deep at administration that it is willing to risk the mistrust that will come from hiding information?

The Charlatan learned this summer just how suspicious and secretive administration has become. Some of the paper's staff were recruited to submit a piece about Carleton to Key Porter Books, a company publishing a guide with reviews of Canadian universities.

When they contacted administration for some statistics and interviews with university officials, administration clammed up, refusing to help out with what is essentially a promotional entry in a helpful national guide. In fact, administration refused to confirm facts gathered independently when the guide's editor tried to check them.

Of course, if you had the tumultuous past that Carleton has had in surveys and rankings, you might be a tad suspicious as well.

In 1990 Linda Frum's Guide to Canadian Universities referred to Carleton's nickname "Last Chance U," a name that has haunted the school with the country's most generous admissions requirements.

Carleton's haphazard data collection for the Maclean's survey in 1991 earned them a dismal 44th ranking out of 46 universities, prompting a lot of soul-searching by the university. Indeed, Farquhar himself pondered resignation over the 1991 survey fiasco.

Subsequently, Carleton poured $100,000 worth of staff and resources into compiling data for the 1992 survey.

Maclean's has succeeded in intimidating universities into participating in their survey by penning universities who do not submit complete information.

Last year, two universities who did not co-operate with Maclean's requests for information were ranked dead last in their category.

Despite administration's efforts, Carleton was ranked as a mediocre university in a mediocre category, 6th of 12 in the medium-sized university group.

There are obvious flaws in any ranking system. Numbers do not tell you a lot about the atmosphere of the school, the particular strengths and weaknesses of its faculty, or the quality of its student services. You don't even know if the student paper is any good.

Maclean's says they met with Carleton this summer and addressed any concerns administration had about the survey. So, why then did Carleton wait until late September, when most of the data should be compiled, to announce to the world its defection from the report?

Did Carleton know all along it would not participate this year, as part of a new agenda to guard state secrets? This move will certainly leave Maclean's little choice but to leave Carleton out of the survey if no updated data is available at this late date, as the universities issue is due out in early November.

This is a complete reversal from last year's party line at administration, when Farquhar admitted, "Being ignored would be worse than being included." Has this attitude changed in this one short year?

Despite Maclean's manipulation of universities and despite the perils of being compared to older, more prestigious universities (or even just better ones), Sparky was right last year: Carleton must participate.

The universities issue has a wide readership and there is a perception by many people — right or wrong — that the Maclean's survey is useful and accurate. High-school students hear about how universities compare in the survey, whether it affects their final choice or not.

What has changed is the attitude of administration towards publicity about Carleton. The university loses respect and prestige when it can no longer openly and effectively communicate with the various press sources in the community.

Like the former Soviet Union, the mistrust bred by excessive secrecy will threaten the relationship between administration, students and the community. AK

Health system needs help

by Clayton Wood
Charlatan Staff

Ask someone what the best thing about Canada is, and more often than not, you'll hear them singing the praises of our health care system. And why not — you don't have to pay for it because it's free, right? Well, as the old saying goes, you get what you pay for.

Unfortunately, many Canadians fail to realize that in adopting a socialist-style health care system, they have given up a precious freedom, that being the freedom to choose the quality of their own health care.

Under the present government monopoly on health care, people are prohibited from spending their own money on a higher level of service.

I need eye surgery, and had to wait nine months to see a specialist. He told me I'd have to wait another eight months before I could be operated on, due to a lack of available hospital space in Ottawa.

Problem is, I plan to be working in Europe in eight months. The operation I need isn't urgent, but I should be able to get it done when it's convenient for me. I explained this to my doctor, and offered to pay out of my own pocket for faster, more efficient service.

He said if he accepted my offer, Bob Rae's government would put him in jail for five years. This claim is an exaggeration, but doctors who charge more than the set fees face stiff fines and could have their licence suspended.

I asked my doctor to recommend a specialist I could see in New York. I was told to go look in the yellow pages. It was then I knew our health care system was really in trouble. When it comes to the point when people have to start consulting the yellow pages of an American state just to get some basic health service, you know the system is totally messed up.

In Canada, the government prevents people from spending their own money on better quality health care. If this practice was allowed, all those nasty rich and middle-class consumers would start paying for their own health care. God forbid, the sacred principle of equality would be violated.

In Canada, it seems everyone has equal access, but it is access to a bankrupt system. It seems the only way to get better care is to leave the country.

A recent story in The Globe and Mail reported that a Toronto hospital tried earning extra revenue by performing late night CAT scans on pets. Meanwhile, people were having to wait weeks for the same service.

It was okay to pay for Fido's CAT scan, but not his owner's. When the media exposed this practice, the hospital responded by banning the scans for pets instead of allowing people to pay for the same service.

This farce best illustrates the shortcomings of our crumbling health care system. Talk of user fees and other band-aid approaches to fixing the system neglect the real problem.

Canada's health care system cannot continue in its present form because it is fundamentally flawed. It is founded on the premise, now discredited in the former Soviet Union and most of the social democracies of Europe, that governments can make everyone equal. The government is guaranteeing everyone equal access to a health care system that is no longer working.

The sooner real change occurs in Canada's health care system, the better. We should institute a model, similar to those in Germany and Great Britain, which guarantees a basic level of health care to all its citizens, but ends the government monopoly and allows people the freedom to pay for a higher level of care if they wish to.

The days of unrealistic and unaffordable social programs are over. If fundamental, structural reform is not instituted soon, there may not be much of a health care system left for anyone in this country, no matter how willing they are to pay for it. Q

Handbook Excludes

Editor:
 I'm feeling a little left out and I'm sure a lot of other students at Carleton are too. You see, we just found out that according to the Carleton University Students' Association, we don't exist or maybe our images just don't show up in photographs.

The CUSA 1993/94 Handbook, which more appropriately should be called "A Handbook for Some of Carleton's Students," is now available on campus.

If an alien landed on the Carleton campus and was given the handbook to learn about our university, it would think that Carleton is comprised of 99 per cent white/Caucasian students of European descent. Why is the large population of "visible minorities" (for lack of a better term), not represented?

There are some in the handbook, for example, a couple on the cover, but finding them is like looking for Waldo. Then there's the posed shot in the library and of course, most importantly, there's the international students shot, because all of us colored people had to have come from somewhere else.

My suggestion for the production team, who can't see the forest for the trees, is to go get their eyes checked.

Editor:
 Re: CUSA '93/'94 Handbook
 I was really pleased to get my free copy of the student planner. I thought: hey, what a great idea, now I can copy down all those important dates.

Except there's a problem. Not a big one, mind you, an oversight, really. They forgot my birthday. Left it right out. Now, I won't take it personally. I'm sure there was a good reason and there probably aren't too many other people with birthdays on Nov. 29.

It seems that leaving Nov. 29 off the calendar was done to accommodate the introduction of Nov. 31. I hate it when I miss important announcements.

I would appreciate any advice as to when to celebrate my now non-existent birthday.

Editor:
 Re: "Unicentre may bear Aykroyd's name," The Charlatan, Sept. 16, 1993.

I read with dismay that a proposal has been put forth to rename the Unicentre after comedian Dan Aykroyd. I don't believe the issue is Aykroyd at all, but rather the fact that we (as a community) didn't take the opportunity to rename the Unicentre after Pauline Jewett, a prominent contributor to Carleton University, Canadian politics and Canadian education.

It was less than a year ago that Carleton had a referendum to have the Unicentre renamed after Dr. Jewett. She was the first woman to assume the role as president of a Canadian university in Burnaby, B.C. As well, she was a prominent and important contributor to Canadian politics, serving in the House of Commons as an MP. Most importantly, Dr. Jewett served as a faculty member for many years at Carleton and her final responsibility was as chancellor of the university.

Unfortunately, students at Carleton failed to contemplate the impact Dr. Jewett had at Carleton and subsequently denied her the honor she deserved. It is my hope this can be accomplished in other fashion.

Editor:
 The following letter is concerning frosh week '93 and some of the shit that accompanied it. I found that this event contained its good as well as its bad points.

Specifically, the green wristbands. I was told that these were a requirement if I wished to participate in the planned events. As it turned out, only at the Minipalooza were they actually checked. So, I spent $54 for a T-shirt, a mug, calendar, Minipalooza, a condom and a first-rate key chain.

It may have been policy to only permit frosh with wristbands, but it was not enforced.

Secondly, Chris Rock possessed less skill at stand-up humor than Joe Clark. His choice of material could not have been worse. It is one thing to make fun of a racial group, gender or minority and then move on and make fun of another. Rock began with women and ended with them. I know that numerous women on my residence floor left the "show" out of disgust.

Lastly, Mike Mandel, the hypnotist. I thought this show was a gem. He was humorous and fun. He made asses out of some friends of mine and I thought it was great. I thoroughly enjoyed him and expect him back next year.

I think that frosh week on the whole was a success. I just hope that next year's frosh won't have to put up with some of the same shit as we did.

Oh yeah, did anyone see the prizes for theoutine tank? I was told there would be great prizes. All I saw were recycled frosh kits that bore the words "Orientation '91." This sure sucked and I felt ripped off.

SUE RODRIGUEZ'S LEGAL BATTLE COMES TO AN E

by Franco D'Orazio
Charlatan Staff

One week from today the Supreme Court of Canada will decide how a woman from Victoria, B.C., who suffers from Lou Gehrig's disease, will die: she can be assisted in committing suicide, or choose to slowly starve to death, as she becomes too weak to swallow and her body succumbs to paralysis.

The ramifications of the decision will reverberate throughout the country. It will fuel the current ethical debate about euthanasia among academics and the medical community, and could inject a campaign issue into the forthcoming federal election that the major parties are doing their best to avoid. In the case of voluntary euthanasia, a patient who is severely incapacitated asks a physician to take his or her life. Involuntary euthanasia is when a physician or loved one decides to take the life of a patient who they believe is suffering, without the patient's request. This is frequently the case when a patient is incapable of coherently requesting euthanasia.

But Sue Rodriguez is arguing that physician-assisted suicide is not euthanasia.

"She is not asking to receive euthanasia," says Rodriguez's lawyer Chris Considine. "She is asking for a physician-assisted suicide."

Considine says if the Supreme Court finds in her favor on Sept. 30, she will ask to have a physician place a lethal amount of morphine into an intravenous tube. Rodriguez would then "activate" a mechanism which would administer the dosage herself.

"At this point, she is still capable of that," says Considine.

But Section 241(b) of the Criminal Code of Canada makes it illegal for anyone to assist Rodriguez in taking her life. It states very clearly:

"Everyone who aids or abets a person to commit suicide, whether suicide ensues or not, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 14 years."

Considine says Rodriguez is not arguing for the legalization of euthanasia, but is advocating the access to the tools with which to commit suicide. Considine argued before the Supreme Court that as it stands, the law is discriminatory and unconstitutional to the extent that it prohibits a terminally ill person from committing suicide.

Rodriguez and Considine are challenging Section 241(b) under Sections 7 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Section 7 guarantees that everyone has the right to "life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof . . ."

Section 15 prohibits any discrimination before the law, especially discrimination based on race, ethnicity, color, religion, sex, age, or mental or physical disability. Eike-Henner Kluge, a former director of medical ethics and legal affairs of the Canadian Medical Association, also believes the law discriminates against Rodriguez.

"She has two options: she can die as a result of her disease or she may commit suicide before she is unable to do so by herself," Kluge says.

But by killing herself before she would need assistance, Rodriguez would not enjoy the extra days she could if a doctor was able to legally assist her in committing suicide, says Kluge.

"She would be forced to sacrifice her freedom by doing so, and this is differential treatment," he said in a telephone interview from his home on Vancouver Island, where he teaches philosophy at the University of Victoria.

As Kluge wrote in a recent issue of the Canadian Medical Association's Journal, "We should make due allowances for the differences among persons if these differences would, or would likely, prevent these persons from taking equal advantage of the opportunities that are open to other members of society.

" . . . Failure to provide some means for overcoming her handicap is to discriminate against her on the basis of her disability." Rodriguez has been fighting in court to prove this for the past 10 months.

She received some financial support in the beginning of her legal campaign from the advocacy group Dying With Dignity, but now relies on public donations and the goodwill of her legal counsel.

Rodriguez first appeared in the Supreme Court of British Columbia in December 1992, but the court ruled against her contention that it is unconstitutional to prohibit her being assisted in committing suicide.

Rodriguez then appealed the decision in the B.C. Court of Appeal in February of 1993. Again, the court ruled against her and it moved on to the Supreme Court in August. For Rodriguez, who turned 43 last month, the ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada will mark the final episode in her struggle to control her own life and to choose the manner in which she will die.

Last year, Rodriguez told The Globe and Mail her story. She described how her hands began to twitch in October 1990. She said she thought it was a result of too many long hours spent tapping away at a word processor at the real-estate agency where she worked.

Ten months later, after the twitching had worsened and she began losing control of her hands, a neurologist told her the bad news: she had a terminal disease called amyotrophic lateral sclerosis. ALS is also called Lou Gehrig's disease, named after the New York Yankee's first baseman who died of the disease in 1936.

There is no known cure, and no one knows what causes it. But as Rodriguez learned, ALS affects the nerve cells which control her muscles. As the nerve cells die, her muscles will weaken.

In the statement she submitted to the B.C. Court of Appeal, Rodriguez said she no longer wants to live when, in her mind, her life is devoid of any dignity, such as when she becomes dependent on machines to live.

But by then her diminished physical abilities would prevent her from committing suicide without any assistance.

Many academics and members of the medical community worry about the implications of legalizing physician-assisted suicide, fearing it would eventually lead to the legalization of euthanasia, both voluntary and involuntary.

André Lafrance, president of the Ottawa chapter of Canadian Physicians for Life, says by granting Rodriguez the right to an assisted-suicide, the Supreme Court would pave the way for the needless killing of thousands of people.

"It is the foot in the door approach," Lafrance says. "At first you have a desolate case (like Rodriguez), and then the next won't be as serious."

Lafrance says this is exactly what is happening in the Netherlands, where euthanasia has been tolerated for the last 20 years and given "quasi-legal" status.

A Dutch court ruling in 1973 recognized euthanasia as an individual's right and set out procedural guidelines for physicians, but the government has never passed any formal legislation to the same effect.

"Holland has opted for killing people," says Lafrance.

The Rimmelik Commission, a 1991 Dutch government commission which conducted confidential interviews with physicians, found that guidelines laid down to regulate euthanasia are being "systematically" flouted.

The commission claimed this was happening even though physicians in the Netherlands are supposed to consult their colleagues when they consider administering euthanasia and submit written reports, as well as having it be requested by the patient.

According to the commission's report, 14,691 people in the Netherlands die every year because physicians administer euthanasia "even though (their patients) make no request for it."

"What we have found, according to the commission's report, is that a lot of physicians are not consulting their colleagues or writing their reports. In fact, a lot of them are falsifying their reports, claiming that their patients have died of natural causes," says Ian Gentles, who teaches the history of population at York University and is research director of the Human Life Research Institute in Toronto.

"Doctors are assuming they know what is best for their patients," says Gentles.

"What we have is older people carrying written notes reading, 'I do not want to die. Please revive me if I am found unconscious.'"

Lafrance objects to euthanasia, because he says instead of being motivated by compassion for the terminally ill, it may serve as a cost-cutting measure.

Lafrance says it is no coincidence that in the Netherlands, there are very few hospices or palliative care programs, places where the dying are cared for and made as comfortable as possible before they pass on.

"The cheapest way to treat the ill is to kill them," he says.

Lafrance says within 30 or 40 years, Canada's aging population will place a great deal of stress on Canada's health care system.

"In Canada, care for the elderly accounts for half of the health care budget," he says.

"The percentage of the population today aged 65 years and older is 11 per cent. But in three of four decades, that figure will rise to 25 per cent. Just imagine the cost."

Serge Lafond, director of analysis for the health insurance directorate of Health and Welfare Canada, estimates that roughly $67 billion was spent on health care in Canada in 1991/92, by both private and public health insurance programs.

Despite being illegal, euthanasia is practised in Canada on a large scale, according to Ted Boadway, the director of health policy for the Ontario Medical Association. Boadway addressed the CMA's annual convention in Calgary on Aug. 23, saying that Canadian physicians practise euthanasia as discreetly as possible to avoid attracting attention which could possibly destroy their practices.

At the convention, the medical association released the preliminary results of a survey of 2,990 Canadian physicians, 60 per cent of who "support some kind of legislative change" in regards to euthanasia.

"According to a 1989 Gallup poll, 77 per cent of Canadians support one form of mercy killing or another," says John Hosfess an executive director of The Right to Die Society of Canada based in Victoria.

However, both the federal Conservatives and the Liberal opposition are not willing to discuss the issue of euthanasia.

"The government simply has no interest in this," says Hosfess. "It's an uphill battle." On March 22, New Democratic MP Ian Waddell introduced a motion to simply consider "the advisability of introducing legislation on the subject of euthanasia."

The motion was soundly defeated by the Tories and the Liberals in a 141 to 25 vote. Liberal MP Don Boudria is one politician opposed to legislating euthanasia. Boudria says he has "never asked" his Liberal colleagues what their views are, but his opposition is based on several grounds: "It cheapens human life, it damages and ruins the trust between doctors and patients, and it is morally wrong." He is also fearful that the abuses in the Netherlands will repeat themselves in Canada.

"If voluntary euthanasia works fine, we'll move to the next step, which is involuntary euthanasia," he said. But Hosfess says federal politicians' reluctance to pass euthanasia legislation for fear of abuses occurring in Canada is not justifiable.

"A lot of bad laws are passed, but they are revised," he says. "If people acted out of goodwill instead of (like) adversaries, we could fashion laws for people like Rodriguez."

Last February, Liesbeth Rensman, a spokesperson for the Dutch justice department, announced that the Dutch parliament will study the practices of physicians administering euthanasia for three months to assess the severity of the abuses being committed.

If the abuses prove to be minimal, the Dutch parliament will consider introducing guidelines for involuntary euthanasia, meaning that physicians could legally take lives without their patients' consent.

But the Supreme Court of Canada cannot take into consideration the findings of the Rimmelik Commission in the Netherlands, the Canadian Medical Association's deliberations, or a Gallup poll in deciding Rodriguez's case.

Instead, it must concern itself with Rodriguez's claim that the section of the Criminal Code prohibiting assisted suicide is unconstitutional, because it violates her rights enumerated in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The Supreme Court will render its decision Sept. 30 at 9:45 in the morning.

"The Supreme Court will rule against her because suicide is not a right," predicts Boudria.

But Kluge will "bet you dollar for doughnuts that the Supreme Court will rule that the criminal legislation is unconstitutional and will dump it onto Parliament's doorstep for the politicians to deal with."

The irony of it all is that many people suffering from ALS and other terminal diseases may benefit from the decision, but Rodriguez may not.

According to Kluge, she now has difficulty swallowing food and requires the constant care of nurses.

"It is exactly the state she did not want to be left in." □ Ravens rebound to victory

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

They're probably still celebrating. The Carleton Ravens football team snapped a 12-game losing streak stretching over two seasons with a dramatic and controversial 19-18 win against the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees on Sept. 18 at Lansdowne Park.

Carleton 19 Ottawa 18

With 17 seconds left in the game and the score tied at 18, Raven kicker Chris Giacobbi missed on a 24-yard field goal attempt and the Ravens eked out a single point win.

But the win was tainted by poor officiating. An Ottawa field goal in the last minute, which would have put the Gee-Gees ahead 21-18, was disallowed after a line judge ruled it had not gone through the posts. The win raises the Ravens' record to 1-1 while Ottawa drops to 0-2.

"It was incredible. It was so satisfying," said linebacker Hubie Hiltz, who has suffered four years of Raven frustration. "Those last few minutes, we just wanted to get out there and win that game. We knew we could do it and we were pumped for it."

With the victory sealed and the last few seconds ticking away, the Ravens' offensive line sacked Gee-Gee quarterback Wayne Jacobs three straight times to end the game.

"We're just going to live this up for a couple of nights," said running back Chris Dorrington, savoring the win.

The Ravens dodged bullets the entire game to pull out the victory. At halftime, they trailed 12-3 but should have been down much more. The Gee-Gees had two touchdowns called back on penalties and kicker Rick Melnyck also missed a field goal. All told, the Gee-Gees were penalized 135 yards on 15 penalties.

"I'm not accustomed to losing in this stadium," is what head coach Donn Smith said he told the Ravens at halftime, alluding to his championship years with the Ottawa Rough Riders. "It's my home park and I told them that if they couldn't win it for themselves, then win it for me."

The Raven defence stood its ground in the second half and the offence finally began to move the ball.

Raven quarterback Sean O'Neill tossed a 23-yard TD pass to slotback Chris Coulter to narrow the gap 12-9 early in the fourth quarter. Following a timely interception by Raven linebacker Martin Smits, O'Neill connected with Dorrington on a 17 yard TD pass-and-run play to put Carleton ahead 16-12 with under three minutes to play.

Soon after, a botched Ottawa punt forced the Gee-Gees to concede a safety, giving the Ravens an 18-12 lead.

Then the drama began. On the ensuing kickoff, Ottawa recovered a fumbled return and quarterback Wayne Jacobs tossed a 25-yard TD to running back Angelo Miceli to even the score at 18. With the game on the line, Gee-Gee kicker Melnyck hit the uprights on the convert.

Line judge John Lamont ruled the ball no good despite Ottawa's protests that the kick was good. While replays show the ball did indeed go through the posts, a referee's decision is final.

"It was clearly in," said Ottawa head coach Larry Ring. "I had referees calling me on Sunday to apologize."

"We worked hard to overcome our mistakes, took the lead and kicked the convert to win the game and then had it taken away. It was very disheartening to see the game taken away like that."

Carleton then regained the momentum on a 29-yard punt return by running back Wayne Wilson. O'Neill then Statistically, O'Neill was good on 11 of 16 passes for a total 160 yards with two interceptions. Ottawa starting quarterback Steve Clarke and backup Jacobs tallied 200 net yards of offence on six completions in 23 attempts. Each threw an interception.

Dorrington pulled in four catches for 52 yards and one touchdown for Carleton, while Miceli with 40 yards on two touchdown receptions was Ottawa's favorite receiver. □

RANT 'N' RAVEN

New attitude adjustment scores results

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

They did it.

After a 12-game losing streak spanning two seasons of frustration, agony and despair, the Carleton Ravens football team finally did it -- they won a game.

Facing off against the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees at Lansdowne Park this past weekend, the Ravens eked out a thrilling, and it must be admitted, lucky 19-18 win against their cross-town rivals. Now, one can argue that the only reason why the Ravens won is because the Gee-Gees threw the game away with countless stupid penalties -- 15 for a loss of 155 yards, if you're interested.

Secondly, if you're so inclined, you could blame the win on the officiating. After all, it was a referee's call going Carleton's way on an Ottawa convert attempt that gave the Ravens a second chance at victory. With the game tied at 18, Gee-Gee kicker Rick Melnyck's kick hit the uprights and then bounced into the end zone before being ruled "no good" by line judge John Lamont. Talk about good fortune.

Finally, if you're more in touch with the cosmos, you could also reason that it was about time the law of averages kicked in and swung Carleton's way.

Or, consider this: maybe the Ravens pulled this one off for another reason. Maybe they did it because there's something different about this year's team. Something that's been missing in the past -- forgotten, unused and lost; but something that's been rekindled this year.

Something called attitude.

Since April, when new head coach Donn Smith stepped in to take control, a subtle change in atmosphere has taken place around the Raven locker room -- for the better.

Smith himself exudes confidence. And why shouldn't he? Everywhere he's gone, he's come up smelling like roses -- two Grey Cups with the Ottawa Rough Riders, three Schenley award nominations as the outstanding Canadian in the CFL, three all-star selections and a national junior championship with the Ottawa Sooners football club. But those accomplishments are in the past, and Smith is forever looking to the future.

What he's done in less than a month since training camp started is instill enthusiasm, desire and confidence into a Raven squad that had lost so many times it had forgotten how to win.

Fresh young rookies have no recollection of the lean years. Instead they have a belief in their system, their coach and themselves.

These guys believe they're going to win.

You could see it in their faces even when Ottawa stormed back to tie the game at 18. No despair and no regret. Just a determination to get their offence back on the field for a final drive to victory.

That attitude has resulted in one victory -- now can they do it again? □

Carleton sailors launch newest club

by Shannon Fraser
Charlatan Staff

It's been launched.

Carleton's newest sports team, the sailing club, has spent several busy afternoons this past week promoting sailing.

And it seems to be working. The members list now numbers 45 and it continues to grow daily.

"In truth, we expected 10 to 15 people to show up and we got more than 40 and interest is still growing. We're hoping to be one of the largest and most dynamic clubs on campus," said Cressida Robsom, one of the founding members.

The group is still not an official club funded by the Carleton University Students' Association, but hopes to be after a Sept. 28 meeting where they will finalize their members list and complete a constitution and budget as required for club status.

The club aspires to become a varsity team at some point, a status which would bring increased funds from the athletics department and more support from Carleton.

In the meantime, the group is trying to form an affiliation with the Britannia Yacht Club on the Ottawa River. In return for access to the BYC clubhouse and use of their junior dinghy fleet, the sailing club will provide the BYC with an "infusion of keen sailors into a dying youth program at their club," said sailing club executive Sean Liddy.

Sailing was rejuvenated at the university level in 1991-92 by the Royal Military College in Kingston and McMaster University. Both these teams joined the Middle Atlantic Intercollegiate Sailing Association (MAISA) of the United States Intercollegiate Sailing League.

Since then, Queen's and Western have joined and the Carleton club hopes to follow suit. The club plans to write a letter to the MAISA executive by Nov. 6 in order to apply for associate membership for the 1994 season.

As associate members, they would be permitted to compete in MAISA regattas and be responsible for hosting one regatta every three years.

The sailing club will be open to all interested students. Physical fitness and attendance are not compulsory. Members will be taught by certified instructors.

"Carleton sailing is for everybody," said Robsom. "All you have to like is a little bit of frostbite and some ice cubes in the water."

There are four upcoming regattas the club hopes to participate in this fall. This first one is the Boulevard Club Invitational in Toronto on the Oct. 9 weekend. □

Raven men remain undefeated with win

Two steps forward and none back. That's the picture for the 2-0 Carleton men's soccer team after a convincing 3-1 victory over the Ryerson Rams Sept. 18 on the Carleton soccer field.

Carleton 3 Ryerson 1

While Carleton had the majority of chances in the first half, the Rams were able to capitalize on a lapse in the Ravens' defence to post the first goal of the game.

A "defensive blunder" is what coach Sandie Mackie called the Ryerson goal, adding that it was the turning point of the game. "That was when the team realized they would have to perform a bit better," he said.

The Rams pulled out what tricks they could in an attempt to stave off a Ravens' comeback, with delaying tactics ranking high on their list.

"They were smart," said Ravens John Lauro. "When the ball went out, the goalkeeper would walk to the ball."

But thanks to a volley by right full-back Andre van Heerden, the Ravens were able to leave the pitch at halftime with the game tied at one all.

"John (Lauro) got the ball; he couldn't turn with it, so he headed it back out to me," said van Heerden. "The ball was at my side, and I just volleyed it with my foot, and it went to the top corner"

Five minutes into the second half, the Ravens scored again when Lauro's header mixed with a cross from Basil Phillips.

"It was fantastic," said Lauro, "because it took the pressure off."

The Ravens dominated their opponents in both speed and ball skill. Their aggressiveness helped them gain possession of the ball in most one-on-one situations, while their speed essentially neutralized the Rams' use of an offside trap.

"(The offside trap) worked to our advantage because our forward line was a lot quicker than their defence," said Raven fullback Marty Lauter.

Perhaps the Rams could have benefitted from a pre-game pep talk from Lauter, who summed up his team's strategy.

"Our philosophy is don't mess around with (the ball) in our end, get it up, put a lot of pressure on, get a lot of crosses in, and try to get some knock-downs."

Staying true to his tactics, veteran Lauter provided the Ravens with their third and final goal of the game when he knocked the ball in off a Lauro header.

The Ravens' next game is Oct. 22, when they play on their home pitch against the Queen's Golden Gaels. Last year, Queen's was the only team to beat the Ravens in regular season action. □

Raven Rumblings

QUOTE OF THE WEEK

"We will win some games this year. I have no doubt of that. How many I can't predict, but we certainly won't go 0-7."

Football coach Donna Smith predicted this past weekend's win back in May when he took over the team.

CALENDAR

Friday, Sept. 24.

FIELD HOCKEY - The women's field hockey team will play their home opener at Minto Field in the Nepean Sportsplex against the York Yeowomen. Game time is 2 p.m.

Saturday, Sept. 25.

FIELD HOCKEY - The field hockey team continues their homestand with a 5 p.m. game against the University of Toronto Blues.

FOOTBALL - The Carleton Ravens football team will travel to Kingston this weekend to kick off against last year's Vanier Cup champion Queen's Golden Gaels. Game time is 1 p.m.

SOCCER - The Carleton men's soccer team will host the University of Toronto Varsity Blues at 1 p.m. looking to improve their record to 3-0.

The women's soccer team will follow with a 3 p.m. match against the Varsity Blues women's team.

RUGBY - The Carleton rugby team will host their home opener against the Brock Badgers at 1 p.m. on the rugby field.

Sunday, Sept. 26.

FIELD HOCKEY - Still at Minto Field, the women's field hockey team will finish their three game homestand with a noon game against the Trent Excalibur.

ROWING - The rowing club will participate in their first event of the year this weekend. They will co-host the Head of the Rideau regatta on the Rideau Canal. Racing begins at 8 a.m. near the NAC and finishes by the Dows Lake Pavilion.

Wednesday, Sept. 29.

RUGBY - The rugby team will host the Royal Military College Redmen on the rugby field at 4 p.m. □

Injuries plague team but women prevail

by Sam S. Aaron

Ouch.
Injuries were the issue of the day as the Ravens women's soccer team shut out the Ryerson Lady Rams 1-0 Sept. 18 on the Carleton soccer field in their season opener.

Carleton 1 Ryerson 0

Rookie defender Stacey Doherty injured her eye in the second minute of play against Ryerson when a soccer ball hit her in the eye and burst a blood vessel. She was taken to the Ottawa Civic Hospital and will be out of the lineup until October.

"It's a pretty bad loss because she's a very strong player," said forward Mary McCormick. "Her size is important and we don't have many fullbacks, which is what she plays."

Doherty joins a long list of Ravens already suffering with injuries — Genny Lussier, Susie Lussier, Corrine van Ryckede Groot, Ann-Marie Irwin and Kathleen Annis.

"My biggest concern right now is injuries," a flustered coach David Kent said after the match. "They're really scaring me. I want us to be a full team."

On the field, Carleton scored the first and only goal early in the first half when walk-on rookie sweeper Nicole Menard scored off a corner kick by Christine Archibault.

Goalie Kristina Bacchi did a fine job preserving a shutout in the highly defensive match but she was relatively untested. The Lady Rams only managed five shots on the Carleton net.

Team play was acceptable, but could have been better, said Kent. "Technically we did fine, but we should have had more shots on goal," he said.

Co-captain McCormick agreed. "We didn't play as well offensively. We didn't capitalize on our chances as much as we should have," she said. "The score should have been much higher. In the past, we've beaten them by incredible goal margins."

Last year Carleton defeated Ryerson 5-1 and 3-0 in two regular season matches.

McCormick said she saw some positive signs though. "We were playing very well together. And I have confidence in (our rookies)," she said.

McCormick mentioned midfielder Jennifer Price and striker Doherty in particular. "They're both strong rookies. Stacey (Doherty) is a strong defensive player. They'll make a big difference on the team," she said.

The Ravens' next game will be Sept. 22 when they host the Queen's Golden Gaels on the soccer field. □

Field hockey team falls flat

One point in three game series on the road

by Ray Verbyla
Charlatan Staff

Two heartbreakers and a nail-biter amounting to two losses and one tie turned the field hockey Ravens' first weekend of the season into a nightmare.

The Ravens lost 3-1 to the Waterloo Athenas in their first game, 2-1 to the Guelph Gryphons in their second and salvaged a point in a scoreless tie against the University of Western Ontario Mustangs in game three.

Waterloo 3 Carleton 1 Guelph 2 Carleton 1 Western 0 Carleton 0

The Ravens started quickly in their first game against Waterloo, striking in the first minute of play on a goal by midfielder Suzanne Bird.

This lifted the confidence level of the team, said coach Suzanne Nicholson.

Waterloo tied the game at one later in the first period. The Warriors then pulled away in the second period with two goals, capitalizing on poor Raven defence, said Nicholson.

Having stayed close during much of the first game, Nicholson was confident the Ravens could hold their own against Guelph, who finished third last year in the Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletic Association field hockey league.

The Gryphons jumped out quickly, surprising Carleton goaltender Julie Sudds with a goal in the second minute of play.

The Ravens though, hung tough, grinding it out to break the shutout on a goal late in the first period by forward Nathalie Chychrun. With halftime looming and the momentum in their favor, the Ravens promptly coughed up a second goal to Guelph.

"We just lost our concentration for a moment," said Wilson. "And they took advantage of that."

Trailing 2-1 in the second half, the Ravens defence shut down the Gryphon forwards, but a sputtering Carleton offence could not capitalize on any scoring chances.

"Offence has to start in your own backfield," said Nicholson.

"If your defence can't get the ball to the wingers, you won't score."

Moving the ball up the field will be a priority for the Ravens in upcoming practices, Nicholson said.

Grinding it out in their third game, the defence clamped down against Western, allowing no goals. This would have been a victory and two points for Carleton had they been able to score, but Western was up for the challenge, allowing no goals as well.

The result: a 0-0 double shutout. Nicholson was pleased with the performance of all her rookies. But she stressed again the urgency with which the defence has to start moving the ball up the field more effectively.

The Ravens limped home with an 0-2-1 record in tow.

Carleton will have only two practices before they head straight back to Kingston to face the Queen's Golden Gaels on Sept. 22. The Ravens then come home to Minto Field at the Nepean Sportsplex for the Sept. 25 and 26 weekend to face Toronto, York and Trent. □

Rugby team comes from behind to win

Kicker Mike Rys knocks in four field goals for the win

by Matt Shurrie

Defence stands tall.
The rugby Ravens headed into Waterloo to play the University of Laurier Golden Hawks on Sept. 18, and demonstrated that defence would be their calling card in the upcoming season.

Carleton 12 Laurier 7

The Ravens defeated the Golden Hawks 12-7, moving into a first-place tie with Trent and the Royal Military College in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's second rugby division.

"For their first game of the season, the team performed well," said coach Lee Powell. "However, they also showed me where areas of improvement are needed."

Powell specified aggressiveness among the forwards and concentration on ball possession among the defence as areas where the team needs practice.

Rookies were a positive force in the victory.

"With a lot of the veterans from last year's team gone, this year's new crop of young rookies stepped up to fill the holes," said four-year veteran Mike Rys. "There are a bunch of great new guys on this year's team, and their contribution will be important for us to contend for first place in the second division."

Jason Hann, a third-year member of team, said he thought the team played "quite well by incorporating a mixed offensive effort with a good defensive style."

Carleton opened the scoring with a three-point penalty kick before the Golden Hawks stormed back with a five-point try and two-point convert to take a 7-3 halftime lead.

"At this point in the game, Laurier was leaning on us," said Mike Rys, "but in the second half, we turned up the pressure on Laurier a bit."

Rys came through for Carleton with three more penalty kicks in the second half to give the Ravens the lead.

Then the defence took over.

With under five minutes to play and Laurier driving down the field, the Ravens defence prevented the Golden Hawks from scoring. After having goofed on two previous attempted interceptions, outside centre Rick Haldane finally succeeded. With the ball rolling off his arm and down his back, Haldane ran down the field trying to get control of the fumbling ball.

"It was a funny play. Everyone on the sideline was watching him trying to hang on," said Powell. "It took us out of our own end and relieved the pressure."

In other rugby action, the rugby Ravens' second team tied Laurier's second team 7-7.

"They showed a lot of promise," said Powell. "I expect some of them to move up to the varsity squad later on in the year."

The Ravens will play their next game on Sept. 25 at home on the rugby field against the Brock Badgers. Kickoff is scheduled for 1 p.m. □

The Ravens outthrustled and outmuscled the Golden Hawks when they had to.

There's nothing wrong with being a bad vegetable. Not everyone can be a Silken Laumann or a Nolan Ryan. But the Carleton athletics centre can help keep you from looking and feeling like a total potato head.

Besides, your tuition fees include an athletic fee of $127 that automatically grants you certain free services and discounts not available to the public.

So take advantage of them. Depending on what strikes your fancy, you can register for a variety of fitness classes. Dancefit is a course that will make you sweat to choreographed moves. Step aerobics classes can provide a low-stress workout. If you're a super keen fitness freak, the high energy "phytiness" course is for you.

Now don't be afraid you won't be able to keep up with those energetic instructors - because they're highly paid professionals who will be happy to demonstrate all aerobic moves.

If bouncing around to music doesn't inspire you, check out the bodybuilding courses. Separate classes are available for both men and women. If classes aren't your thing, you can also workout on your own time at the fitness centre for free. It includes weight training machines, exercise cycles, rowing machines and an indoor track.

For a real heavy workout, there's also a heavy weight training room and nautilus centre. Both will cost extra.

The heavy weight room includes a power rack for squats, olympic bars and benches, heavy fixed weight dumbbells and curl bars for a school-year fee of $70. The nautilus centre will set you back $165.

Maybe competition turns you on, or you just like to hit things with a racket. If so, you can book a tennis or squash court in advance and pound out life's frustrations on a little ball.

An hour slot on the tennis courts can be booked through the tuck shop for a paltry $2.14. If that's too rich for your blood, you can play on a court for free until someone with a booking kicks you off. Courts are open from 7:30 in the morning till 7:30 at night.

Squash court bookings are divided into prime and non-prime time slots. The prime-time fee of $3.75 for 40 minutes applies to weekend mornings up to and including noon, weekdays during the noon hour and all weekday slots from 4:40 p.m. till closing at 10 p.m. All other times are non-prime and cost $2.14.

If running, sweating, or competition aren't for you, there's always the swimming pool, sauna and whirlpool. Carleton has an Olympic-size pool open daily for recreational swimming. And if you don't know how to swim -- take lessons!

Depending on the program, the cost will range from a minimum of $19.26 for Red Cross level courses and a maximum of $107 for instructor level courses. Might be worth it if you fall into the canal without a life preserver.

You can register for all courses at the athletics office on the second floor of the athletics centre if there's still space left in the course.

So no more excuses and no more regrets. Why be a couch potato when you could be the cream of the crop? □

DEADLINE: OCTOBER 1

Does a Vanier Cup await an O-QIFC team?

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

Bishop's Gaiters

LAST YEAR: Finished first in the O-QIFC division during the regular season with a perfect 7-0 record. Beat the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees 21-13 in semi-final action, but fell apart in the conference final losing 32-6 to Queen's.

STRENGTHS: Consistency and talent. Bishop's appeared in the O-QIFC championship game for the seventh time in eight years last season. In awards ceremonies, the talent-rich Gaiters placed eight players on the conference all-star team and two on the all-Canadian squad. Head coach Ian Breck captured the 1992 CIAU coach of the year award.

WEAKNESSES: The choke label. Despite being a perennial conference powerhouse and Vanier Cup contender, Bishop's has never advanced past the national semi-finals to the big game. It appears the Gaiters might not have the "bite" it takes to be a champion.

PROGNOSIS: After having 52 returning veterans show up in training camp this season, Bishop's is sure to place another strong contending team on the field. A 6-1 record is likely to lead to a conference championship. But no more.

Queen's Golden Gaels

LAST YEAR: Finished 6-1 in regular season play. Defeated McGill 24-21 in semi-finals and then avenged their only loss of the regular season by trouncing Bishop's 32-6 in the conference final. Advancing to the Churchill Bowl, the Golden Gaels beat the Ontario Universities Athletic Association Conference winner Guelph 23-16 to move on to the national final. Queen's flattened the Saint Mary's Huskies 31-0 to win the 1993 Vanier Cup.

STRENGTHS: Tradition and defence. Another perennial contender, Queen's has gone to the Vanier Cup four times in the past 24 years and won three. Last year's defence held the opposition to a mere 102 yards and they're back this year as strong as ever.

WEAKNESSES: Offence. Last year's Canadian Interuniversity Athletic Association sensation, running back Brad

Elberg is back, but eight members of the Queen's offensive juggernaut have departed. Eager talent alone won't fill that void.

PROGNOSIS: Only two teams have won back-to-back Vanier Cup titles, Manitoba (1969 and 1970) and Western (1976 and 1977), so history isn't on Queen's side. A 4-3 record will be good enough for third place, but don't expect the Golden Gaels to escape their conference this year.

McGill Redmen

LAST YEAR: Finished third in the O-QIFC with a 3-4 record. Lost 24-21 to Queen's in semi-final playoff action.

STRENGTHS: Maturity. The Redmen were within grasp of first place last year, but lost three games by seven points or less in the dying minutes. Now they're a year older and wiser. They won't let the close games slip from their grasp as easily this year.

WEAKNESSES: Defence. The backfield is a mix of returning starters and fresh neophytes. Until this unit begins to mesh, it can be manipulated.

PROGNOSIS: Expect the Redmen to challenge for the conference title. A 4-3 record is likely but this team still needs more seasoning before celebrating a playoff victory.

Ottawa Gee-Gees

LAST YEAR: A 2-4-1 record was good enough to clinch the last playoff berth but no more. The Gee-Gees lost their semi-final playoff game 21-13 to the conference champion Bishop's.

STRENGTHS: Sound fundamentals and speed. Head coach Larry Ring is in the second year of his rebuilding program and football fundamentals are now understood. Both the offence and defence is blessed with speed at most positions.

WEAKNESSES: Despite a year's maturity, this is still a young and inexperienced team. Only 10 players on this year's roster were with the team when coach Ring took over in June of '91. The talent and depth have improved but the expertise is missing.

PROGNOSIS: A 3-4 record would constitute a successful season, especially considering the strong opponents the Gee-Gees have to face in their rebuilding efforts.

Concordia Stingers

LAST YEAR: A 2-4-1 record was good enough for fifth place finish in the O-QIFC after Concordia lost the last playoff berth to Ottawa on tie-breaker rules. The Gee-Gees racked up more points on offence so they snatched the last playoff spot. It was the first time the Stingers had missed the playoffs in four years.

STRENGTHS: Defence. The backfield was what kept the Stingers competitive last year when their offence failed them. That core is back and ready to punish.

WEAKNESSES: Inconsistency. Concordia beat nationally ranked Guelph in pre-season, lost a hard-fought 13-8 decision to the eventual national champion Queen's Golden Gaels in their season opener, and registered a dramatic 25-24 come-from-behind victory over the McGill Redmen in the annual Shrine Bowl. Yet despite their apparent competitiveness, they only managed to win two games during the season.

PROGNOSIS: If the defence holds steady and the offence finds itself, a 3-4 record isn't out of the question. But anything more is wishful thinking.

Carleton Ravens

LAST YEAR: After a 1-6 season two years ago, the Ravens hit rock bottom last year, falling to 0-7. Carleton missed the playoffs for a fifth straight year.

STRENGTHS: The future. The Ravens believe the worst is behind them. New head coach Donn Smith brings a championship aura to Carleton - two Grey Cups with the Ottawa Rough Riders, and a national junior championship with the Ottawa Sooners - and he will try to infuse the Ravens with that winning spirit.

WEAKNESSES: Inexperience. Part of Smith's off-season revamping was a threat that no spot on the roster was safe. Consequently, while there are returning veterans on the squad, the Ravens will sport a lineup composed of numerous fresh faces. Elementary mistakes will take their toll on the team.

PROGNOSIS: "Back to the basics" will be new head coach Donn Smith's rallying cry as he attempts to rebuild the Ravens from scratch. One win would render the season a success. And a 1-6 record isn't out of the question - whoever heard of a back-to-back winless seasons? □

Coming from someone who has absolutely no qualifications or experience in photography criticism, I think I can safely say that the theme linking the images -- regardless of what Bellissent says -- is not inherently obvious from the photographs themselves.

One of the exhibits is a photograph of four men standing in a scrapyard. I asked her how that was related to what she calls the "unhealthy irretrievable ambiguities present in male/female relations."

She told me she could see it. I guess I'm just stupid or something because it didn't say anything to me. This may seem a little critical, but I think

Don't ask us.

I had the chance to speak with Bellissent at the exhibit.

"I photograph what I see," she says, as a way of explaining just what Wilt On's about. "There are a lot of things that happen all the time but people never photograph."

This is true, I thought to myself, as I noticed the photo of some pregnant womart that people can't relate to makes a real dud of an exhibit.

Even so, I'll confess that the mundane and desolate images combined with the soundtrack certainly did bring words like "wilt," "decay," and "degenerative" to my mind. The exhibit is, if nothing else, appropriately titled. □ all me a closed-minded and ignorant hick from small town Ontario, but I've always thought that one of the main purposes of art is to communicate a message or convey a feeling, on whatever level, to other people.

That's why this exhibit is a failure.

This installation consists of 12 moody black-and-white photographs with a low, murmuring soundtrack complete with industrial-type hissing and the occasional muffled shout. The creator of the exhibit, Montreal artist Sophie Bellissent, has already had other shows in several Canadian cities and Mexico.

According to Bellissent, the spontaneous images in the photos were selected from about five years of work. The images are pretty eclectic, with the exception of several prints of nude women -- something that seems to be a compulsory requirement for all exhibits in this museum.

In the exhibit's ridiculously obtuse explanation, mounted on the wall, Bellissent writes that Wilt On is the (take a deep breath, folks) "result of a fascina-

Bagels, goatees and (briefly) music

by Tim Pryor
Charlatan Staff

Doughboys guitarist Jonathan Cummings is taking his newfound popularity in stride. "I've been doing interviews all day so I haven't had a chance to eat my bagels."

A few years ago, Cummings could probably have eaten all the bagels he wanted without interruption. Not anymore.

The Doughboys' major label debut, Crush, is their first full-length album since 1989's Happy Accidents. It's getting rave reviews -- the first single, "Shine," is getting radio airplay and the video is in regular rotation on Much Music.

After three independent releases on Restless Records, and touring across the globe, Montreal's favourite pop-core sons are finally flirting with the mainstream. Cummings could not be happier.

"Crush is the definitive Doughboys record. It's a really live-sounding record, and that's basically what we wanted to do. With previous records like Happy Accidents, we were getting a little too self-serving. I think there was a certain level of masturbation, musically and lyrically, that is not really evident on the new record."

After working with several different producers on previous records, including members of All, California's emcore kings, the band tried producer Daniel Ray of Ramones fame for this record.

Cummings gives credit to Ray for making Crush such a great sounding record.

"Daniel's whole thing was like working with the Ramones and stuff like that, which made a lot of sense for us, because a lot of the stuff on the record is influenced by the Ramones, but there's also songs that are a little more challenging.

We were wondering if he was into doing stuff that was a little more unsafe.

Cummings and Kastner: Hair, Everywhere!

"Daniel finally came down from New York to watch us jam, and we were getting such a cool vibe off him, and (he) understood where we were coming from and where we wanted to go. He was not one of those people who produces just to pay the rent. We didn't have to worry about some guy who produced Kriss Kross coming in and saying 'I want you to do this.' Danny wanted to do a punk record, and we wanted to make a punk record, and it really worked out."

Cummings hasn't had time to concentrate on the hoopla surrounding a major-label release. The band just finished a European tour and they start a Canadian tour this week.

"We don't really know about it," says Cummings of the media hype. "We've been in Europe for the past three weeks. We've been getting the transatlantic phone call saying 'You guys are the next Beatles!' or whatever, you know, record company stroking. We don't see it. We'll probably see it on this Canadian tour. But you're just being told that, you're not really seeing it."

Cummings has even managed to avoid seeing Shine on Much Music, no small feat these days. While he is doubtful that videos have much artistic merit, he does admit they expose the band to new fans.

"The record and the shows are the important things. Videos are just like advertisements. It makes Joe Average go out and buy our record, instead of actual musical enthusiasts that will go seek out records. I hate making videos. The only way I would be comfortable making a video is if I wasn't in it. Picture yourself putting a big plank of wood in front of you, calling it a guitar, completely not plugged in, and you lip-synch to a camera. And then all your friends watch it."

The music and touring are important, but true Doughboys fans want to confirm the rumor: did Cummings recently cut off his infamous goatee?

"I did. I could no longer eat soup any more. I was known as 'the guy with the beard on his face,' and you don't know how crappy it is having a conversation piece on your face all the time. My girlfriend kept saying 'Shave it off, you look like some sort of David Koresh follower.'"

"Right after we finished the Shine video, I thought 'Okay, it's documented.' So I shaved the thing off, and my girlfriend freaked! I got somewhat of a goatee now, but that's because I've been on tour, though. Facial hair is our idea of fun when we're on tour." □

Bad play earns regretful slagging

Clutching The Heat
Great Canadian Theatre Company
Sept. 15 through Oct. 2

The problem with theatre in Canada is that there isn't enough of it.

At a time when Canadian cultural is under constant attack from outside sources, and when Canadian artists have trouble breaking into their own domestic market, something like the Great Canadian Theatre Company (GCTC) here in Ottawa is a rare gem indeed.

And the fact that the GCTC is one of the few venues in Ottawa which provides an opportunity for Canadian talent to strut their stuff makes it all the more difficult to criticize the work done there.

But cultural protection notwithstanding, there are some harsh realities about the GCTC's latest production Clutching the Heat, not the least of which is that it isn't a very good play.

In fact, it sucks.

The play, written by Maristella Roca, attempts to examine the relationship between the members of an Italian immigrant family, focusing on the father's family past and the effect it has on the raising of his own children.

This is not a particularly original story and the characters are punched out of the same boring and timeless mould.

The father is a tortured but misguided asshole who yells at his kids while vainly attempting to bestow his knowledge upon them. The mother is dedicated to her husband and children to the point of sacrificing her own happiness for them.

The daughters are the usual stereotypes: there's the good-looking, popular eldest, daddy's little girl in the middle, and the troublesome youngest child.

The latter sees her father for what he is. She unwittingly torments him because she is, to him, his mother reincarnate. She represents the prodigal daughter.

Clutching the Heat types, looking understandably cheezed.

The story line and the characters provide all the essential ingredients for a Neil Simon comedy-drama about the interrelations of a family. It would almost work, if it wasn't such standard fare.

To muck things up further, the play's flow is interrupted by unconventional scenes, which attempt to portray the emotions of the characters. This too would be fine, except that it's impossible to figure out what the hell they mean. Exactly what do the naked blue guys on stage represent?

If the play had been either a conventional narrative or a bizarre expression of family members' emotions, it could have been good. Instead, it tries to be back wall of the stage and using actors and a film projector to simulate home movies. These and a few other set design quirks are highly effective.

A large portion of Clutching the Heat's score is performed live by Rob Frayne. From his vantage point in the audience, he plays a variety of instruments (sax, accordion, drums, flute) in conjunction with the performances. He is a tremendous musical talent, and the live music adds an edge of style to the otherwise dreary experience of watching this play.

The acting is generally passable, with some excellent performances by Tracy Wright as the youngest daughter and by Diane Fajiras as the mother. Fajiras speaks alternately in Italian and English with an accent throughout the entire play, and whether the accent is real or faked is indeterminable.

Unfortunately, Chip Chuiyka as the father fails to muster the necessary intensity to make his character believable. So central is his part to the feel of the play, that if his performance had been better, the entire play would have been much improved.

Roca has put many of her eggs into this character and unfortunately, Mr. Chuiyka drops them and they break. It's messy.

The theatre, on the second night of the play, was less than half full. As audience numbers dwindle, so do independent theatre companies like the GCTC, so go see some plays there.

just not this one. □

Teaching the Educated to Read!

The main cause of student drop-out is stress — stress over not having assignments finished, stress over not staying "caught-up" with the class, and stress over the realization that just staying "caught-up" isn't going to be good enough.

1993 was the worst year in history for students getting jobs right out of college, and this next year looks even worse.

It isn't always the smartest students who get the best grades, but it is always the best readers — the ones who can get the most out of their books on their own.

Simply getting through your reading assignments will only give you the minimum that your professor requires to pass you. Just passing your courses isn't going to be good enough anymore.

In fact, having a diploma or a degree only allows you the opportunities of furthering your education with a more competitive group of fellow graduates.

The '90s will continue to be a decade filled with the most rapid change ever seen in history. Only those who are able to adapt to those changes will be able to remain competitive.

Being able to read all your reading assignments and additional reading selections with increased comprehension and recall will be a pre-requisite for anything you plan to do in the future.

The difference between a good mark and a great one will depend on your ability to read and learn on your own.

Power Reading is the Solution!

Power Reading is an eight-step video course that was developed on a college campus and initially designed for college students. With recent developments in video and computer graphics technologies, this course can now be offered on video, allowing you to learn in the privacy of your own home — at your own pace.

This course will absolutely at least double your reading speed with increased comprehension.

True Romance: "No sir, I didn't like it."

by Jane Tattersall
Charlatan Staff

True Romance
U.S.A., 1993
Directed by Tony Scott

really wanted to see this flick.

Not that I'm the biggest Christian Slater fan, but with a supporting cast that includes Dennis Hopper, Gary Oldman, Christopher Walken, and Brad Pitt, I figured this movie couldn't miss.

"The Bonnie and Clyde of the 90s," as it's being advertised, actually translates into the biggest waste of my time this month (and that includes lining up to pay tuition at the gym). This movie suffers from unconvincing characters and a weak plot line.

Slater and Patricia Arquette (Rosanna's sister) play the heroes, Clarence and Alabama. They meet at a Kung Fu triple bill, and go home together.

Afterwards, Clarence finds out that Alabama is a hooker with a heart of gold and they fall in love. The action starts when Clarence decides to kill Alabama's pimp (played by Oldman) on the advice of Elvis (can you imagine pitching this to a movie exec?). When the pair gets mixed up with a suitcase full of drugs, some mafia-types start chasing them. Ultimately, they end up in Hollywood.

Slater portrays Clarence in the same manner he portrays all his characters — as a cocky, self-assured kid. As Alabama, Arquette giggles and simpers her way through the film in tight bodices. She tries to be cute but just ends up being annoying.

All her outfits show plenty of cleavage, which the director makes the most of in every shot. Ultimately, she is a reinforcement of the Hollywood "dumb blonde" stereotype — her response to every situation is to giggle stupidly.

One of the film's basic problems is that the audience is supposed to like Clarence and Alabama. This is impossible because they are two of life's big losers. The film doesn't give us any reason to like or respect them, and consequently, you don't even care when they come close to getting killed. They are definitely not the types that should be glamorized in a movie, and that is what True Romance attempts to do.

Elvis worshipper meets dumbblonde — total Hollywood!

Another reason the film is so weak is that all of the best actors are underused. Dennis Hopper is convincing as Clarence's straight-edge policeman father, and his scene with mafioso Christopher Walken is unforgettable. As a coke-snorting production assistant, Bronson Pinchot provides some of the lighter moments in the film, as does Pitt who plays an eternally stoned guy.

The director tries to hide the movie's faults by using lots of graphic violence. People are sliced, beaten, and shot. In one scene Arquette brandishes common bathroom products in a decidedly non-hygienic manner.

The violence is both unnecessary and disturbing, because it doesn't fit the upbeat tone of the movie.

True Romance flows to a predictable, kind of funny climax, complete with lots more blood. Most of the time though, it is disjointed and unconvincing.

It's hard to understand how a film about two pathetic individuals could earn the amount of hype this one has. The makers of this film are operating on the assumption that the IQ of the average viewer is about 50, so if you like movies with a point you are bound to walk out feeling disappointed. Wait for the video instead.

Home Alone brat goes on murderous rampage

by James G. Stansfield
Charlatan Staff

The Good Son
U.S.A., 1993
Directed by Joseph Rubin

Considering Macaulay Culkin's short movie career, it was hard to grasp the idea of him playing any type of character outside his Home Alone persona.

Culkin has pretty much been stereotyped in different roles as a smart little bratty kid left to deal with extraordinary circumstances. These roles have left him with very little to act upon.

Since most children find it easy to act like children, Culkin's job as an actor has not been stressed at all. To be honest, he appeared not to act at all during his first movies.

When I first heard of his role in The Good Son, I really didn't want to see the movie. He plays a bad kid in the movie and with the obviously ironic title, I assumed it would be another Problem Child movie.

Culkin plays a bad kid, but not of the garden variety — the kind who spites his parents and breaks all the rules for the fun of it.

Culkin as Henry goes beyond bad. This boy's psychotic, infatuated with understanding death and its implications, Henry takes his "scientific discoveries" to their logical extreme and people start dying.

Culkin has a remarkable grasp of this character. It was especially nice to see the director found no reason to include Culkin's patented hands-pressed-against-his-face scream.

The movie oddly enough does not centre around Henry, but rather his cousin played by Elijah Wood, of Lorenzo's Oil fame. Wood plays Mark, who loses his mother for some untold reason. His father leaves Mark in the care of his brother Wallace's family for two weeks while he plays executive in Japan.

Mark settles in with his relatives and he and Henry become fast friends. It's winter break, and for two young boys, the world is theirs. Henry proves the honesty of his friendship with Mark by showing him all his secrets — his treehouse, a slightly modified crossbow bolt gun and a sobering cliff face at the edge of town.

Mark soon discovers Henry's fixation with death and he is disturbed by it. Henry is able to dance around his cousin with clever words, perfect timing and execution. Henry turns out to be a great manipulator, using his childhood innocence as a backbone.

Mark, left seemingly alone, is powerless to stop Henry and tries his best to thwart his plans.

The only thing standing in his way is the fact that no one will believe him. Henry worms his way into everyone's confidence and subtly manipulates each confrontation against Mark.

The acting is superb all the way around with the plot running at a fast pace. Each character is well-conceived and except for the small subtleties in dialogue making the kids sound older than their age, the screenplay is brilliant.

Surprisingly good acting on the part of Culkin adds just the right mix of suspense. After seeing him in this new light, I can only imagine what may lie ahead for this actor. The only thing holding him back now is his age.

Technically, this film came off with a great run of special effects and the plot was akin to a rampant boar — once it started it was not going to stop until it was damn ready to stop.

The only mistake I found in this movie is that a safety wire is not only clearly shown when someone falls off a cliff, but when the said person stops their descent, a nice closeup shot actually shows the person holding on to the wire. This is a monumental error which could have been easily concealed.

Twentieth Century Fox probably spent all their money landing Culkin and had little left for special effects. This type of error should have been left on the editing room floor.

The act of saving a buck in this film destroys the entire credibility of the story to this point, as we are no longer led to believe that the person is in any real danger.

Regardless, the film is worth seeing if you enjoy a good, suspenseful movie. The story will keep your mind on the edge about this kid who has proved that a cute smile and false demeanour can cover the worst forms of evil.

Fishbone

Give a Monkey a Brain and He'll Swear He's the Centre of the Universe
Columbia

Within seconds of listening to the latest release from L.A.'s Fishbone, those already familiar with them will realize something's up — Fishbone have gone thrash.

Then again, anyone the least familiar with the band won't be all that surprised since they're known for their musical experimentation.

Once you get through the first couple of songs, it becomes evident that Fishbone haven't completely abandoned their jazz and ska roots. They've merely altered and matured them.

Tracks like "Unyielding Conditioning" and "Lemon Meringue" are reminiscent of some of the stronger material found on Truth and Soul. Much of the album takes off from where segments of The Reality of My Surroundings left off.

But if thrash isn't your cup of tea, don't fret. Fishbone continue to offer an abundance of musical diversity. Their latest effort is certainly Fishbone's finest piece of work yet.

It's not as dry or boring as Fishbone's Truth and Soul and is easier to digest than the jumpy The Reality of My Surroundings.

Give a Monkey a Brain was co-produced by Terry Date, renowned for his work with both Pantera and Soundgarden, and was mixed by Andy Wallace, who has mixed albums for the Rollins Band, Slayer and Helmet. There is little doubt that both Wallace and Date have been a factor in the heavy guitar sounds Fishbone experiment with on their latest release.

What continues to make Fishbone such a great band is their honest passion for their music, a shortcoming of so many other bands today.

Give a Monkey a Brain is not merely Fishbone's finest album to date, it is among the best albums to have been released by any band in quite some time.

Genitorturers

120 Days of Genitorture
I.R.S.

The three-word capsule review:

Limpid Ministry rip-off.

The longer commentary:

Violence on TV has finally done it. I don't consider myself jaded, but this group, like a even more putrid hard-core version of Blondie, doesn't do anything to shock or excite me.

The tens of thousands of murders and acts of violence the tube dropped in front of me since childhood, immemorial must have truly numbed me. I was not in the least bit disturbed by 120 days of genitorture.

Because the warning sticker — "explicit lyrics and graphics" — completely covered the front of the cassette, I expected something truly upsetting. But the cover was Gen, the buxom blond lead vocalist, only piercing a metal rod through her tongue or, more likely, just licking it.

Gen plays the part of fetishist and dominatrix. I have enough people telling me what to do. I don't need Gen huskily demanding worship. When she isn't, she's singing lame lyrics like "Jack me, smack me, bend me over and spank me" or "make it harder, make it hurt." Other songs have similarly intellect-free choruses, such as "Force Fed" or "Crack Track."

The band's anger, hostility and witlessness may be connected to the band's locale. They hail from Orlando, Fla., home of the Magic Kingdom.

Ouch!

Such a reaction against the Disney attitude of ceaseless happiness could be expected, almost enjoyed, if it hadn't been done better many times before.

David Bartolf

Lost City

Watching You
Scotti Brothers/Attic

Not a single bad word to say about this, Lost City's debut album. Lost City has a really unique style of music, melding funky guitar solos with songs that range from heavy rock 'n' roll to light and airy ballads.

The musical grapevine suggests that Lost City is considered (by some) to be sort of a Cream rip-off, which is arguable. After listening to their tape Watching You at least 46 times, I feel that they have their own distinct sound and are not trying to become what once was.

I think that every song on this album is great and would never compare their talents to Cream, let alone any other musical greats. Actually, that's a lie. The beginning of "Life" has a tinge of Pink Floyd-ish sounding rhythms. If you want to talk about big band rip-offs though, take a look at Queensryche's "Silent Lucidity." Now that sounds très Pink Floyd.

Watching You has 11 songs which are all commendable, "Believer," "Last Crescendo" and "I'll Be Watching You" to name a few. And the children's harmony in "Tears & T-Cells" adds a sweet, soft touch. These guys are a great band and all I can say is, I'm glad that Lost City was found.

Jodi Batori

Smashing Pumpkins

Siamese Dream
Virgin

Smashing Pumpkins seem to be the "alternative" band of the moment. This being their sophomore release and their first album for a major label, it should do very well in the sales department.

That said, there are a few things I noticed about this album. First, it sounds more like hard rock than what is usually deemed alternative.

Second is the presence of Butch "Nirvana" Vig as producer. He's doing for alternative rock what Bob Rock's doing for the metal crowd by making their music more accessible. Vig's trademark sound of polished yet abrasive guitars (chew on that contradiction for awhile) is quite evident.

He and the band journey from the crashing guitars of "Geek U.S.A." to "Soma," a song which manages to avoid the clichés of the rock ballad by having some growl in there next to the strings.

As for the question as to whether Mr. Vig managed to capture the band's soul, I'm not entirely convinced. Although Siamese Dream will probably garner a few listens by yours truly, it's lacking something. It's missing that emotional attachment that separates the seminal recordings from the good recordings.

It doesn't take my heart and rip it out of my chest. Oh well, that may come in time. It's probably too much to ask of every band anyway.

This may be the end product of the mainstream co-opting of the Seattle sound, but it still sounds good, even if it isn't angelic.

Blayne Haggart

I Mother Earth

Dig
EMI

If you crossed the rough style of Soundgarden with the mood and psychedelic feel of early Pink Floyd, you'd probably end up with a band that sounds like I Mother Earth.

The tracks on Dig are generally well-written and diverse in style and structure. Most of the 12 songs make use of numerous time changes, alterations in mood and in tempo which all result in rather lengthy songs.

The album's cause is helped by the strong, tribal style drumming of Christian Tanna.

Lyrically, the album is obscure, abstract and unpredictable. The distinct lyrics are backed by the fairly unique vocals of Edwin. At times, though, he does sound a bit like Perry Farrell.

Although Dig is a pretty good debut album, it seems to lack a coherent musical focus. The band's experiment with many musical genres leaves the album sounding jumpy in spots.

The album is well produced by Mike Clink, known for his work with Megadeth and Guns N' Roses. He's probably responsible for giving the album what it has in the way of musical focus.

It should prove interesting to see where I Mother Earth progresses to musically in the future.

Hey Kids!

Boy have we got a prize for you this week!

It's won the Governor General's Award and the Booker Prize. Maclean's says it's "One of the finest Canadian novels ever written," and for once, they're right!

It's Michael Ondaatje's The English Patient!

All you have to do to acquire this fine piece of Canadian literature is answer this skill-testing question:

In the Blue Rodeo song "Outskirts," what two hotels are mentioned?

That's it. Drop your answer off along with your name and phone number in the Arts Editor's mailbox by 3 p.m. Monday, September 20. The winner will be selected in a random draw. Charlatan staff aren't eligible for this wonderful contest.

Good Luck!

Congratulations to Corey Harper who knew that one of the rejected names for the new Nirvana album was I Hate Myself and I Want To Die. Corey wins a tacky, nine-piece puzzle of Garth Brooks. Come on in and pick up your prize, Corey!

Teen tales and a visit from Brian de Palma

by Sharon Boddy
Charlatan Staff

It's great to see Carleton students — especially arts students — go on to some degree of success. Just look at James E.D. Stewart, who took film studies in these hallowed halls. "She just opened up her life to me," recalls Stewart with a trace of incredulity in his voice. "I guess strangers make good listeners. There's no history or future."

After conducting research at the Canadian Centre for the Prevention of Child Abuse, among other places, Stewart wrote the script.

"It's not autobiographical in the sense that I wasn't sexually abused as a teenager," says Stewart, "but I remember hearing stories of kids I knew at high school. If a kid was nerdy or dorky, perhaps there was another reason for it. Kids are very judgmental and more image-conscious than adults. But they interact with each other more than they do with their parents, so they put on a front, sort of 'everyone's weird but me.'"

Stewart grew up in Ottawa and attended Gloucester High School. "Gloucester was a big school and catered to a lot of different groups of people. There are more social groups now than when I went to school; they're much more defined."

Stewart, a Carleton University film studies graduate, moved to Toronto in 1987. He works as freelance writer, producer and director of corporate and music videos, and on his own film projects when he's able.

The actors in Teen are students from the Cawthra Park Secondary School for the Performing Arts in Mississauga. Working with teenagers was a different experience for Stewart.

"Adults (playing teenagers) remember what it was like to be a teen. They have a larger base to work with," says Stewart. "It's different than someone who's actually living it."

Unfortunately, Teen was not picked up by the Toronto Festival of Festivals. On mention of this, Stewart becomes animated. "Teen was made by a Toronto film-maker, the actors are from Toronto and the film was shot around Toronto."

So why wasn't it picked up by this prestigious festival?

In Stewart's opinion it was because in Teen "there were no homosexuals and no masturbation. And you can print that," he adds.

Having never before attended the Montreal festival, Stewart says he was a "nervous wreck" at the screening. But it did afford him a specific treat.

Stewart remembers, "I had met Brian de Palma briefly at the Toronto film festival last year. When I saw him at the Montreal festival, I went up to him and said, 'You may not remember me but...' We talked for awhile and then I very casually introduced him to a friend of mine and said, 'This is Brian de Palma, he'll be coming to the film with us.'"

De Palma viewed Stewart's film and even gave him a critique.

"He told me what he liked about the film and what he didn't like. He thought I ping-ponged too much between the drive-in and the interviews. I don't think it's his kind of film."

De Palma also used his own video recorder to interview Stewart.

"Someday," Stewart muses, "someone will find the lost Brian de Palma tapes..."

The Charlatan Bar Crawl Hormone Heaven!

by Ian McLeod
Charlatan Staff

Over the years, Oliver's has held a colorful reputation on campus.

Before its closure last March, it was a Wednesday night tradition for many students to put in at least an appearance at this meat market.

Unfortunately for bar management, the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA), there was little reason to recommend it the other six nights of the week. Described by one former patron as "a high-school gym with beer taps," the decor was functional but pretty ugly.

This aesthetic problem seems to have been one of the major reasons for Oliver's lack of financial success (the bar lost about $95,000 last year), and its subsequent closure.

Before Oliver's reopened this fall, CUSA finance commissioner Rene Faucher and the powers-that-be decided that, in order to bring business into the bar, it would be a good idea to create, in Faucher's words, "more of an English-pub-like atmosphere."

A reported $320,000 later, this job appears to have been accomplished. Faux-mahogany panelling, cushy sofas and a long, curving bar create something of a pubby feel, with the intriguing choices of pastel upholstery and frosted-glass partitions tossing in an element of the yuppie fern-and-spritzer bar atmosphere to the main room.

The second room is divided between the billiards area (eight tables, not much waiting) with comfortable seating. A fairly large dance floor will also double as performance space for bands that management intends to bring in on a fairly regular basis.

On the nights when bands aren't playing, DJs will try and get you gyrating to a bouncy mix of dance and danceable pop/rock music.

It's a good thing people can sit and chat on the sofas, hit the dance floor, or shoot some stick, because getting to the bar on a Wednesday night was sheer hell. Massed throngs clamored for the attention of the overextended wait-and-bar-staff, a situation which bar manager Claire Campbell says she intends to remedy as soon as possible.

Hopefully, it will be soon, because the value of drinks ranges from good ($3.35 for a shot of Southern Comfort) to fantastic ($8.50 for a pitcher of Toby), and with the introduction of munchies to the menu (prepped by Capital Foods, but cooked on site) it can only get busier.

The lineups at the bar were long, but they were nothing compared to the lineups to get into the bar. Be prepared to take a number and wait upstairs at Rooster's for your turn to come. It looks like it'll be standard operating procedure when the lines get too long.

And yes, the reputation that Oliver's has held over the years still holds true. The place was throbbing with hormones! Many women sported the expected big hair, although I was disappointed by the lack of the stereotypical gold chains and well-fluffed chest hair. Still, it was gel heaven all around.

Based strictly on observation, the best place to try and pick someone up is not on the dance floor, but rather at the billiards tables. The hand-eye co-ordination and skill required to play pool translate well to the world of dating, to say nothing of the concepts of "balls" going into "pockets," or "getting behind the eight ball."

Cheap beer. Big hair. Dance/pop DJs. Cushy sofas. Long lineups. Not to mention the meat market. This is Oliver's. You be the judge — it's your social life. ☐

My Boyfriend's Back and There's Gonna Be Laundry II . . . The Cycle Continues

Sandra Shamas
NAC Theatre
Sept. 14 — Oct. 2

If you haven't seen the prequel to Sandra Shamas's My Boyfriend's Back and There's Gonna Be Laundry II . . . The Cycle Continues, don't go expecting your typical love-hate relationship play with a plot.

What you get is a chucklehead (read: makes you laugh so hard you blow snot out your nose) one-woman show resembling a standup act about periods, prophylactics and penises. Expect to hoot and holler with recognition at the situations she pokes fun at.

MG: No offense to you, Karin, but I wish Sandra Shamas was my best friend. She kinda reminds me of the sort of person who would make you pee your pyjamas at sleepovers in high school.

KJ: Hey, what makes you think I'm not funny enough to do that . . . Anyhow, I agree. But I think the thing I like most about her isn't her ability to induce urination on a moment's notice, though that is an admirable quality. What I like best is how she mentions the unmentionables loud and clear in her show. How many people have the courage to admit they only wash their hands in the can if someone else is in there with them?

MG: Yeah, or who would own up to having a pair of period panties? The woman's got balls, I'm sure of it. She readjusts her bag on stage better than I've seen some guys do it for real.

KJ: I don't know about balls, but her ovaries certainly are tough. And she makes it pretty clear her humor is more than just something to make people wet their jammies. (That's enough urine jokes! -ed.)

Like when she describes how she knew her partner was the right man for her because he laughed at her jokes, instead of just expecting her to blow a lung over his jokes.

Funny women are still less than the norm in our society, so it's really cool for me to see a woman in front of a packed room, telling jokes about going to the gynecologist. And I like Shamas's humor because it isn't of the slag-'em-insult-the-crap-out-of-'em abusive variety, à la Andrew Dice Clay or Chris Rock, either.

MG: Surely, but I noticed the women in the audience were laughing the loudest and longest, 'specially during the stuff about her pap test and the stainless steel dim sum cart. I thought I felt the older guy next to us squirming in his seat.

But there was definitely stuff guys could relate to as well. Like when she talks about t h a t u n m a g i c m o m e n t when you're trying to get a condom out of the #@*%! package. But the coolest part of her show was her fashion tour of men's underwear. Why is their a flap in their undies if no one uses it?

KJ: I've often wondered this myself. In her first show, she suggested the pocket in the front of a pair of gitch was where guys could put their spare change. Obviously, further research has dispelled this theory.

This was just about the only shtick I recognized from her first show, and even this was still spontaneous. And she handled the crowd well, especially the heckler who decided it would be hilarious to ask her if she'd gone to the washroom during the intermission. She shut him down with grace and snark by asking, "Can I do my show now?". Right on, sister.

MG: I'm so glad she gave it to that losebag. She was in your face all the way through the show, strutting and thrusting and grabbing her boobs. I thought the ending sucked though.

I love her devoted-and-miserable-but-loving-it sense of humor, but as soon as anyone gets into married jokes, they lose me. I don't get why she would get cheesy on us at the end, all wrapped up cosy in pre-marital bliss. Makes me fear her upcoming show in the trilogy, Wedding Bell Hell or whatever it is.

KJ: Yah. Unless her irony was so sharp I totally missed it, the end left me cold. I hope she hasn't sold out. Maybe she's cleverly set us up for another realistic look at her relationships in part three.

Who knows? Maybe the next show will be jokes about who heats the baby formula at three in the morning. No I won't be busting a kidney about that.

MG: Ditto. Marriage just isn't funny. But then again, neither are periods, and she made me blow snot out my nose about those. □

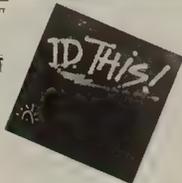

I've seen Chris Rock. This woman is no Chris Rock.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 23 TO THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 30

Thursday, September 23

Go see Thomas Trio and the Red Albino and opening band Tongues and Bones at Fenn Lounge. It only costs $7 and tickets are available at the door and at the residence store, among other places. Show starts at 9 p.m.

Tonight at Creeque Alley it's a benefit for the Ottawa Linkage Committee. They're a group that promotes Third World Trade Union solidarity. They've lined up the best in Ottawa Valley country for tonight's show: Lonsome Paul, Lucky Ron and Sneezy Waters! Tickets are eight bucks in advance (available at the OPIRG office, among other places) or 10 dollars at the door.

Friday, September 24

At 12:30 p.m. in the Alumni Theatre, it's Glimpses of Gaia, "a multimedia presentation combining dance, narration, slides and electronic music" featuring Anjali, an East Indian classical dancer. As if this wasn't enough to convince you to go, it's also free.

It's the concert of the decade at Zaphod's tonight. Well, that may be a bit of an exaggeration, but you'll still enjoy some fine ska courtesy of Toronto's Skaface and those wacky, wacky Montreal funsters Me, Mom and Morgentaler. Seven bucks gets you in.

Under the "I Can't Believe They're Still Around" column... The Royal Canadian Air Force is staging a benefit for Interval House tonight at the National Arts Centre Opera at 8 p.m. Tickets are available through Ticketmaster for $17, $22 and $27.

Critical Acclaim, part of the Great Canadian Theatre Company's NightHowl series, plays Fridays and Saturdays at 11 p.m. until October 2. It's a play about a bunch of actors who kidnap a hostile critic.

At the Stone Angel Institute (314 Lisgar), it's a benefit for the Coalition to Preserve Hudson and James Bay. Gracing the stage is Willie Dunn, Dario Domingues, Iain Rohahes Phillips and Heather Farrow. Tickets are $5 in advance and $6 at the door.

Soul Train, who sound exactly like their name suggests, are playing tonight and tomorrow at Creeque Alley. Go see a white guy belt out some James Brown. What could be more entertaining?

Plus, Carleton's Geography Society and the Rowing Club are holding a pub at Oliver's. Two dollars will get you in to this high culture event.

Saturday, September 25

We've heard lots of good things about I Mother Earth, who are playing tonight at Zaphod's ($7 cover). They're loud and retro.

It's the Air Farce Ottawa weekend! At the Nepean Centrepoint Theatre, ex-Farce guy Dave Broadfoot surprises everyone with his character sketches of Big Bobby Clobber and the MP for Kicking Horse Pass. It's $18.50 for tickets.

The Old Sod Folk Music Society presents Janet Russell and Christine Kydd, "two Scottish singers in sublime harmony," whatever that means. It's at the Glebe Community Centre and tickets are $10 for members and $12 for non-members.

Sunday, September 26

Last day to catch Theatre Distinct's production of Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice in Auschwitz at the University of Ottawa's Academic Hall. Students get in for $12 and the show's at 3 p.m.

I don't know about you folk, but whenever I'm feeling a little down in the dumps, nothing cheers me up like a rousing organ and gregorian chant recital. That's why I'll be at Patricia Phillips's 8 p.m. show at the Eglise St-Francois-d'Assise at the corner of Wellington and Fairmont. And it costs only $8 for students. Wow!

For those whose taste in entertainment runs more to Ukrainian dance, try the HOPAK Ukrainian Dance Company's show at the National Arts Centre at 3 p.m.

Like poetry? Want to support the Ottawa Food Bank? Go to the National Library at 7:30 p.m. Diana Brebner, Elisabeth Harvor and Gary Geddes will do the reading. Just bring $4 and if you bring a food donation you'll be eligible for door prizes!

Monday, September 27

Damage, the Jeremy Irons sexual-political-thriller-type-thing plays tonight at the Bytowne at 9:15 p.m.

Tuesday, September 28

This week's literature selection is The Long Goodbye by Raymond Chandler. Raves Charlatan production manager Kevin McKay, "It's probably the best detective fiction Chandler ever produced!"

Wednesday, September 29

If you still have faith in humanity, check out The Bad Lieutenant at the Bytowne at 9:15 p.m. Actually, the warm-ings speak for themselves. "May offend some, sexual content, drug and alcohol use." Sounds like a family movie to me.

On In A Mellow Tone (CKCU 93.1 FM), Ron Sweetman profiles recent jazz and blues releases.

Thursday, September 30

It's Martin Scorsese night at the Mayfair. The fun gets underway at 7 p.m. with Raging Bull and continues with GoodFellas at 9:25. Before heading out, listen to King Missile's "Martin Scorsese" to get yourself into the mood.

I've never heard of Maria Hawkins, but she does blues every night at Razorbacks Hog Rock Cafe in the market and cover's only two dollars.

If you've got a listing you want to appear in this handy calendar, drop us a line at Room 531 Unicentre during regular office hours or fax us at 788-4051. Listings must be in by the Friday before publication.

Rugby video scores low with some

by Kathleen Jacobs

Charlatan Staff

A video designed to increase understanding among Carleton athletes of racism, sexism and homophobia disappointed some service co-ordinators who viewed it.

The video was recommended by the final report of a university investigation into a complaint made last winter. The complaint alleged that Carleton's rugby team was using a chant book as part of initiation which contained sexually violent, racist and homophobic lyrics.

The complaint was filed by the Carleton University Students' Association (CUSA) on behalf of an anonymous complainant.

Produced by Carleton's Instructional Media Services, the video is expected to cost the department of university athletics $1,000, says the department's director Keith Harris.

It will now be mandatory viewing for all members of Carleton's sports teams.

The video was shown to the football team Sept. 2 and other athletes Sept. 24.

"I think the plan is to show it every year," Harris says, but screening dates will vary depending on the team and when its season starts.

The video is about six minutes long, and consists of speeches by Harris and Carleton President Robin Farquhar. It was screened by Theresa Cowan, CUSA's director of services, members of the Peer Counselling Centre and the Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual (GLB) Centre on Sept. 23.

Peter Nogalo, co-ordinator of the GLB centre, says the video treated the issues superficially.

"The video was lauded as a saving grace that would prevent these problems from ever happening again (but) I can't really see that," he says.

Renée Twaddle, co-ordinator of the Carleton Women's Centre, says she feels Harris owes an explanation to the centre.

Twaddle says although the centre helped bring the chant book issue to the university's attention, they were not consulted in the making of the video.

She says the collective feels "left out of the process," and has sent a letter to Harris expressing their disappointment.

Nogalo says his centre was not consulted either.

Twaddle did not attend the screening with the other service co-ordinators because she has requested a private viewing for the women's centre collective instead.

She says the problems of racism, sexism and homophobia are too broad to address in a video and athletics has "to take this as seriously as the groups that are being oppressed in the (chant) book."

In the video, Farquhar tells athletes he is proud of them and they are "ambassadors" of the university. He says Carleton strives to create "an atmosphere that is comfortable . . . in a safe and non-threatening way" for all groups.

Cowan says she doesn't think the issue of harassment was taken seriously enough. She says she was unhappy with Farquhar's appeal to the athletes as ambassadors.

"I think they should have given guidelines as to how exactly people are supposed to be acting, not necessarily as ambassadors of Carleton but as men and women."

In the video, Farquhar says "it is essential that we conduct ourselves as a non-violent community."

In the video, Harris says athletes are "special" people and encourages them not to take "cheap shots."

While Farquhar does not mention the rugby chant book, Harris says a chanting incident occurred "some time ago."

"Whatever their (the chants) intent, they have no place at Carleton," Harris says in the video.

Dawn Fallis, co-ordinator of the Peer Counselling Centre, says the rugby team's Rebick calls for fundamental change

by Naomi Bock

Charlatan Staff

Canada's present governmental and electoral systems are "undemocratic," says Judy Rebick, past president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women (NAC).

Rebick outlined her proposals to restructure government and the electoral process in a speech to an audience of about 90 people Sept. 28 in Porter Hall.

A freelance writer and activist, Rebick continues to sit on the NAC executive. NAC is an umbrella group representing over 500 women's groups across Canada and lobbies the federal government on their behalf.

"What people are feeling is a lot of anger," said Rebick of the state of politics in Canada today.

She said the current electoral system is fundamentally undemocratic because in order to get nominated, you have to be part of the party elite.

"It creates tremendous barriers to women and minorities because a very small group within the riding tends to control who gets nominated," she said.

Rebick proposed changes to parliamentary representation, where voters could choose as many candidates as they wanted from a list covering a larger area. She said votes would not be wasted and it ensures the popular vote would prevail.

"Making fundamental changes in representation has an impact on issues, an impact on changing power relations.

"This is why major parties don't make changes. They feel more comfortable in a situation where they have control of power and we're outside screaming and yelling."

This may create instability, but Rebick said she prefers that to "a government that gets elected and goes against the will of the people on almost every issue, and we can't get rid of them for another five years. That to me is not democracy."

Rebick said she favors minority governments. "Smaller parties not obsessed with achieving power, focused on issues, help the bigger parties to be more honest and more accountable."

Rebick said she isn't optimistic that women leading two major federal political parties will mean progress for all women.

"We have a situation where two women leaders are in an election where women's issues have . . . gotten so little attention," she said.

Rebick said she supported referendums because they produce legislation which is democratic, whether it be right or wrong. "People will choose the right way, and if they don't, they'll learn the lesson, unlike those with vested power. There's this cynicism because we don't get to debate as a citizenry between elections. When (voters) feel their voice is heard, they are more responsible and willing to compromise."

Rebick also called for a reform of governmental structure.

"No matter how good a person you are, no matter how strong a feminist you are, no matter how much you want to challenge that (status quo) focus, it's almost impossible to resist the forces that are at work in government unless you change the structure of government."

Rebick says under-representation of youth is also a concern. "We have to listen to what young people are saying

New daycare, no new subsidized spaces

by Matt Skinner

Charlatan Staff

A new day-care centre at Carleton, to be finished by late December, will provide five new spaces but none of them will be subsidized, says one of the centre's directors.

Margot Henderson says the new spaces "will go to full-fee paying parents. Whether they're university or off-campus is difficult for me to say."

The existing Colonel By Day Care facilities on campus at Renfrew House and the Loeb building have spaces for 52 children. These will be combined under the roof of the new centre, which will have room for 57 in the new building near the athletics complex. Right now, 42 of the 52 existing spaces are subsidized, says Henderson.

The waiting list for subsidized day care at Carleton is presently a two-and-a-half-year wait, says Kathy Parlee, acting director of the Renfrew facility. She estimates there are about 160 names on the subsidized day-care waiting list at the Renfrew facility. There were no estimates for the Loeb facility.

The centre applies for additional subsidized spaces from the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton each year, says Henderson, but they haven't received any new ones for 1994, when the new centre is scheduled to open.

Carleton's new day-care centre under construction.

"I'm not surprised (that none of the new spaces will be subsidized)," says

Wendy Gold, a second-year student and single mother of a two-year-old girl. "I've been on the waiting list for over two years."

"When I called them (Colonel By Day Care) two years ago I said 'When do you think I'll get in?' They said: 'Well, if you're in a four-year program you might get in your last year.'"

Gold says priority should be given to students, because the day-care centre is on campus. "I'm disappointed," she says.

There is no set allotment of spaces for students, says Henderson.

"Because these are regional dollars, the region would not purchase our service at Carleton University if we discriminated against (non-Carleton students)," she says.

Applicants for subsidized day-care spaces undergo a needs test by the region to determine the level of subsidization, says Henderson. The province and the region determine how many day-care spaces will be subsidized.

The majority of subsidized families pay $25 per month, says Henderson. But the subsidies can range from zero to 100

Carleton gets a new elder

by John Steinbachs
Charlatan Staff

"An elder is a guy with lots of wisdom," says Wilfred Peltier, Carleton's new Native elder-in-residence.

"It has nothing to do with age. I once talked to a 92-year-old man who said he didn't know the answer to my question, so I better talk to his elder."

Peltier, an Odawa Native person, has been hired by the Canadian studies department as an educational and spiritual advisor on Native issues and culture, says Victor Valentine, a professor of Canadian studies.

Peltier says he will create an awareness of Native culture among students at Carleton. For example, he is taking a Canadian studies class to Dunrobin, near Ottawa, for a pipe ceremony in a teepee on Sept. 30.

Peltier is accessible to all students and staff throughout the university, says Valentine. He has office hours every Tuesday and Thursday from 11 a.m. to 2:30 p.m.

"I'm all for alternative ways of knowing and Wilfred represents that."

—Madeline Dion Stout

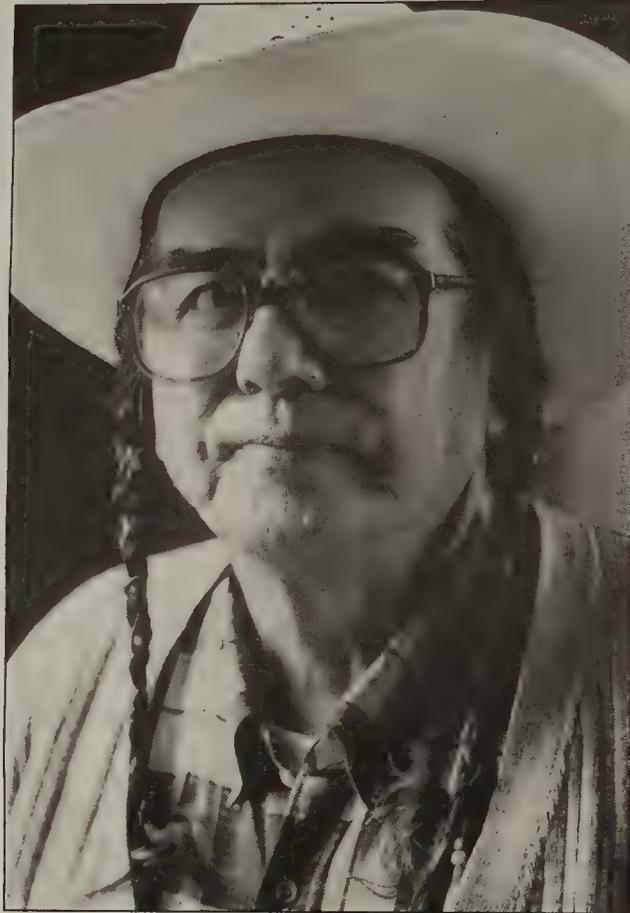

in Room D775 of the Loeb building.

Madeline Dion Stout, co-ordinator of Carleton's Centre for Aboriginal Education, Research and Culture, says a Native elder was needed on campus. "I'm all for alternative ways of knowing and Wilfred represents that."

Peltier says more elders are needed at Carleton. He says many elders have knowledge, but they've been cast aside in institutions such as universities.

"The air is hardly worth breathing, the land is being raped, the waters polluted, the animals are dying, the fish are dying. The whole society is screwed up. We can find the wisdom we need in the elderly."

Peltier was born on the Wikwemikong reserve on Manitoulin Island, Ont., in 1927. He got a masters in Canadian studies from Carleton in 1990, which he says made him familiar with the Carleton community.

"I know my way around. Like, I know Mike's Place."

Peltier says he was involved in Native political issues when he was younger but has now grown tired of all the politics. He now concentrates on Native social issues.

He was a member of the Centennial Commission, which investigated native issues for the federal government in 1967. He also worked with Young Canadians, a program which placed young people as role models on reserves in the late 1960s.

Peltier ran an Indian Ecumenical Conference in Alberta which hosted almost 10,000 delegates in 1970. The conference dealt with young Native people trying to find their roots.

alleged inappropriate behavior "seems pushed under the carpet" when referred to as "some time ago" and not specifically dated.

Harris says the video did not use the words "last year" because the department plans to use the video in upcoming years.

Rea Ghvidito, a first-year basketball player who watched the video, says he didn't know what "the songbook thing" was about but that Harris was "stern" in the video.

"He said the songbook... was not to be used because it was biased," says Ghvidito. Cowan says she would like to see sensitivity training for coaches and have them held responsible if teams act out of line.

She says coaches should be chosen by "what kind of example they're going to set and what kind of crap they're going to tolerate."

But Harris says he thinks this is asking too much.

Peltier says there are a lot of Native people who have been taught not to express their Native culture.

"There are people here who talk their own language, but they won't talk it in public."

Peltier has five books published. A Wise Man Speaks, published in the late '70s, is a collection of Peltier's talks. Two other books, Who is the Chairman of this Meeting and For Every North American Indian Who Disappears I Also Begin to Disappear, are collections of Peltier's poetry and prose.

No Foreign Land, published in 1973, is Peltier's account of his life "to that point." He proudly points out that the book is used in universities across Canada, as well as in Germany and Switzerland. He has also written a book about his childhood, Two Articles, which was published in 1969. Peltier says the book is "about growing up in an Indian village, and how we were raised. It's very different from this society."

Peltier is also a storyteller. He says when he was young his elders told stories on winter nights. Peltier says as he grew "Storytelling is like myth and in myth there is truth."

—Wilfred Peltier

older, he began telling the stories he could remember.

Peltier says storytelling is a great way to get a message across. "Storytelling is like myth and in myth there is truth. We were always taught through stories," says Peltier.

He recalls a story his mother told him about the "Binyusuck," a leprechaun-type creature he says is traditionally found in Native lore.

"One day (Peltier and his siblings) were making a sandwich or something and we left out the butter and it all melted. My mother asked us 'who left out the butter?'"

"We all said 'not me mom.' So she grabbed a broom and started sweeping, poking under the stove and things. When we asked what she was doing, she said the Binyusucks must have left it out and she was sweeping them out of the house. After a while you sort of put down your head and said 'it was me, I left the butter out.'" □

Scotiabank won't follow TD bank's lead

by Clayton Wood
Charlatan Staff

The Toronto Dominion Bank is trying to improve its service by promising customers five dollars if they have to wait in line more than five minutes.

The bank adopted the policy in a bid to give it a competitive edge over its rivals in the area of customer service, says Hugh Fox, manager of administrative services at the TD main branch in Ottawa.

One of its many rivals, the Scotiabank at Carleton University, has no plans to start a similar policy.

"If we introduced it during registration week, we'd run out of money," says Scotiabank manager Don Bailey.

The policy was piloted at about 100 of TD's 1,000 branches over the past year and introduced nationally this month.

"The bank saw a need to be upfront with customers. A five-minute wait is unreasonable," says Fox.

Bailey says lineups at his branch often fluctuate as a result of students' schedules. "We have wild swings between classes and during noon hour," says Bailey.

He says there are usually three to five tellers on duty. Longer lineups can take up to a half-hour and are usually due to the processing of student loans or opening new accounts.

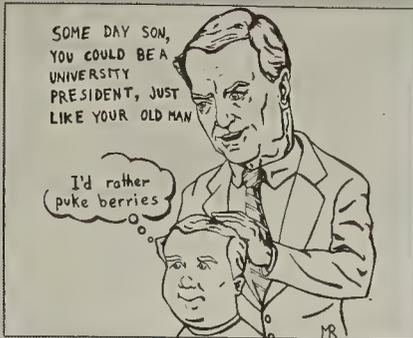

Bailey calls the TD move a "competitive gimmick." He says the recent addition of another bank machine in the Unicentre to the four already on campus will make it easier for people to process transactions without waiting in line at the branch.

Fox says the policy helps put pressure on staff to look closer at areas where service can be improved, such as having more tellers on duty, depending on the time of the day or week.

Some branches in Ottawa may pay out anywhere from $45 to $250 a week, says Fox. The policy runs on an honor system, with the customer's word being enough to receive the five dollars. □

Fun Farquhar Fact

Everything you wanted to know about Sparky but were too apathetic to ask.

by Blayne Haggart
Charlatan Staff

I wouldn't have believed it if I hadn't seen it with my own eyes. Überpresident Robin Farquhar is a somebody.

He's right there in the pages of the 1992 edition of Who's Who in Canada, sandwiched in between true Canadian heroes William Alexander Farlinger and John Stewart Farquharson. And not only his name, but his vital statistics too.

From the first line of his write-up we realized we'd misjudged the man all these years.

For instance, we at The Charlatan knew he was president and vice-chancellor of Carleton University (described as "a comprehensive national university in the nation's capital, Ottawa" — good thing they identified the city. Otherwise we'd have a lot of confused Torontonians on our hands).

But we had no idea that Dr. Robin Hugh (Hugh?) Farquhar, BA, MA, PhD, FCCA, DAE, was born Dec. 1, 1938, shurely the next national holiday.

Or that presiding in universities runs in the family. Pop Hugh E. Farquhar was president of the University of Victoria.

We can just imagine the hikes through Clayoquot Sound, as father passed on a lifetime of accumulated knowledge to the budding technocrat son.

SPARKY JR.: Dad, when I grow up, I want to run a mid-size university, just like you.

SPARKY SR.: Well, son, let me give you just one word of advice. There'll be a time in your life when the chips are down. The media will advance on all fronts, questioning your resolve. When they've got you in the corner and you have no place to turn, do the honorable thing — plead lack of resources.

SPARKY JR.: Dad, you're the greatest.

That's not all. Ever wonder about Sparky's road to the big time? It all started in 1962, when he was a teacher at Edward Milne Secondary, in Sooke, B.C.

From there it was on to a lifetime of administration, degrees, and torment from a mediocre Time rip-off . . .

Actually, there's enough info in his Who's Who entry for 50 Fun Farquhar Facts. Coming soon: Farquhar's carefree days as a Beta Theta Pi! Sparky's adventures as an Honorary Citizen of Winnipeg! Lt. Sparky of the Royal Canadian Navy Reserves — the lost years!

more." When asked about employment chances for young female graduates, she said there needed to be more employment strategies, "managed trade" rather than free trade, and more jobs in the public sector.

One woman asked how she could make herself heard, to which Rebick said she believed in local, grassroots organizing rather than lobbying at the federal level.

"The primary route to change is not parliament. Parliament mostly reflects what's already going on in society."

Mike Duffrensy, a political science student, said Rebick's ideas "are not new, but they're simply not issues in this election."

Carleton President Robin Farquhar called Rebick's talk stimulating.

"I was particularly interested in the young men and the questions they asked.

It's a very confusing time for men, trying to sort out a new set of values."

One man who spoke during the question period said women were not willing to invest the amount of hours needed to succeed, since they wanted to raise families, and that more should be done for them. "I feel for these women," he said.

Rebick's response received applause from the audience. "Women work in the home and workplace much longer than men."

She added that the reality of politics is a male agenda, where women's issues are dropped. Rebick said under proportional representation, this would change.

Farquhar said Rebick told him this was the first time she'd spoken about electoral reform.

"Her thinking hasn't gone through to the fine details of solutions, but at least she's identifying the problems and raising the questions," he said. □ per cent of the cost, she says.

Without subsidized spaces, people are left with full-fee spots. The full monthly fee for an infant or toddler at Renfrew House is $1,189 while the fee for a preschooler at the Loeb building is around $820, says Parlee. Fees for next year have yet to be approved by the province and region, say Henderson.

Katherine Main, executive assistant to the university's vice-president of finance, says "the full-fee spaces are quite expensive. It's quite difficult to find people that can afford it.

"We find it more difficult on campus to fill the non-subsidized spots and so we reach out to the community to people who would like to have children located here in the child care," says Main.

Statistics compiled by the finance office in December showed two full-fee spaces out of the 10 were available in the day-care program, says Main.

At that time there was an almost even split in enrolment between children of students and those of Carleton staff, says Main, and 95 per cent of the students with children in the day care were single mothers.

Twenty-four of the children belonged to students, while 20 children belonged to staff. She says six of the eight full-fee spaces were occupied by children of parents who do not work at or attend Carleton, while the other two were empty.

Henderson says the application for the construction of the new centre was originally filed in 1991, but the plans were delayed until last October, when the provincial government announced it would fund 80 per cent of the project.

The region and the City of Ottawa announced their support for the centre in January of this year, and together will be providing the remaining 20 per cent of the cost of the new centre. The cost of building the new centre is $937,000.

When the city's support of the centre was announced, Jim Watson, city councillor for Capital Ward, said in a press release "with growing numbers of mature students at Carleton, adequate child care must be made a priority. Child care is an important part of a truly accessible education system."

Watson says this is the first time the City of Ottawa has contributed to a university day-care centre, and says Carleton was chosen because of its blatantly inadequate facilities.

"A proper facility for child care at Carleton is long overdue," he says.

Henderson says the playground at the Loeb facility is three floors away and it is necessary to bring 30 pre-schoolers there by an elevator.

The washroom is located outside of the centre in the hall and the only running water comes from a six-by-eight-inch sink, she says. □

Why does the CUSA executive get free coffee at Rooster's Coffeeshouse?

The executive of the Carleton University Students' Association gets free coffee at Rooster's because of convenience, says René Faucher, CUSA's finance commissioner.

Rooster's is run by CUSA. Faucher says CUSA made their own coffee up until a year and a half ago. He says a lot of coffee was being wasted when made in the CUSA office.

"It's a lot simpler. We don't need equipment here. Now if you want one cup you don't have to make a whole pot," says Faucher.

He says he can't estimate how many cups this courtesy (free coffee) adds up to each year.

Mike's Place Pub, which is run by the Graduate Students' Association, occasionally gives free coffee to its regulars and to executive members of the GSA, says Mike's Place manager Ron Boyd.

"For our regulars, if they come in before we open, they might get a free coffee. Instead of paying they'll just make a contribution to the charity we're collecting for," says Boyd.

He says the charities Mike's Place collects for include the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario, the Children's Wish Fund, the Cancer Society and the Food Bank.

Boyd says common courtesy is the reason for the free coffee. He says even his staff members "under most circumstances get free coffee all the time."

Courtesy (free coffee) is also given to CUSA's executive members for the time they put in every day working at the office, says Faucher.

"People are in the office from 9:30 in the morning to 9:30 at night," says Faucher.

Faucher says the courtesy (free coffee) at Rooster's is limited to CUSA executive members only.

"That's one thing we're really strict about. It's coffee.

"No alcohol and no friends; otherwise then it gets out of control," says Faucher.

DEADLINE: OCTOBER 1

Local candidates debate at Carleton

by Brent Dowdall
Charlatan Staff

The Ottawa Centre electoral roadshow passed through Carleton Sept. 28, with an all-candidates debate among the 10 local candidates running in the Oct. 25 federal election.

About 250 students and members of the public filled Baker Lounge and others stopped to look as the candidates spoke about their platforms.

The candidates were asked questions by students on various issues, including the North American Free Trade Agreement, abortion, deficit reduction, job creation, social programs, racism and immigration.

Each candidate had equal time to give opening and closing statements. The debate was moderated by Kristine Haselsteiner, vice-president external of the Carleton University Students' Association.

Here's a brief summary of what the candidates said in their opening statements and responses to questions, in the order in which they spoke:

• Ian Lee (Progressive Conservative Party)

"Education is the only source of competitive advantage in the new economy," Lee said in his opening remarks.

Lee said the federal government should force every university to go to trimester and co-op programs in order to use universities' facilities year-round. He also proposed opening student loan availability to any student without need assessments, and loan payback through the tax system based on a percentage of a person's income after graduation.

Lee expressed support for NAFTA, saying jobs in the old, resource-based economy are disappearing, but new jobs are being created in the area of high technology.

He also said he opposed health care user fees, but also opposed universality of social programs for those who don't really need the help.

• Frank Thompson (Green Party)

Thompson said economic development and environmental protection can be achieved at the same time. He said the party would abandon free trade and NAFTA, and promote sustainable development with environmental technologies.

He also the party would encourage job-sharing and replace all social assistance programs with a guaranteed annual payment to support those who have trouble supporting themselves.

• John Foster (National Party)

"We need a clear, new sense of direction," said Foster. "We've had all the excuses and solutions from the old-line parties. We need a government that listens to the people."

He opposed NAFTA, and called the Free Trade Agreement "disastrous."

Foster said he supported universality of all social programs, but rich Canadians should have their social benefits taxed back and more taxes have to be collected from corporations.

• Keith Ashdown (Independent)

Ashdown, a member of the Ottawa Coalition to Save Clayoquot Sound, said he and some friends were sitting around and they decided to run a candidate "to make their voice heard."

Clayoquot Sound is an old-growth forest area in British Columbia, which the B.C. government allowed to be selectively logged this year.

"Clayoquot Sound is very important to discuss. It's basically become a case study for all environmental issues we're going to face.

"The corporate community says jobs and the environment can't mix — well, yes, they can."

He opposed NAFTA because he said environmental activities could be seen as Marion Dewar and Neil Paterson at the great debate.

ANNA BRZOZOWSKI

restraining trade under the agreements.

• Marion Dewar (New Democratic Party)

"I think it's a watershed election for Canada," said Dewar. "I think it's really important that we start to take our country back."

She said the NDP policy is full employment, funding for small business and general reduction of the deficit. She said the NDP would restore transfer payments from the federal government to the provinces for health and education to the level they were at before 1978.

"It's time to stop talking about our young people as a deficit and refer to you as an investment," she said.

Dewar opposed NAFTA. "It's giving away our sovereignty," she said.

• Neil Paterson (Natural Law Party Leader)

"We believe the best government is nature's government, natural law which governs our universe with perfect order and without a problem," Paterson said, always serenely. "We all know that natural law has that power to put everything in the direction of evolution, progress and growth."

Paterson said he would appoint commissions to study issues affecting Canadians. He said his programs are scientifically proven to work.

• Len Tucker (Reform Party)

Tucker said Reform would revamp the Canada Student Loans program. He said it would bring in income contingent repayment, where students would borrow enough for expenses in university and pay their loans back as a percentage of their income.

Reform would also give a credit or voucher to each student so the universities would have to compete with each other to attract students and their dollars. He said this would make universities and the students more competitive.

He also said Reform would stop government overspending and "balance the books in three years.

Tucker said the Reform Party supports trade deals that improve access to new markets, but said they would not sacrifice environmental or labor standards.

• Mac Harb (Liberal Party)

"Only through education can we guarantee and secure the kind of jobs required for our economy," Harb said. "Jobs offer hope. This election is about providing people with vision."

He said the Liberals are the only party with a comprehensive plan to improve the economy, by "investing in people."

Harb said Canada should "expand on free trade around the world." But he also said the Liberals would renegotiate NAFTA because there are problems with the agreement.

He also talked about "free trade in Canada," by removing inter-provincial trade barriers.

• Hardial Bains (Marxist-Leninist Party)

Bains said the most important issue "is the empowerment of the people," just as it was last year, referring to the demise of the Charlottetown Accord in last October's referendum.

Bains said there have to be changes to the electoral laws, such as recall of MPs and selection of candidates by the people rather than the party. He also opposed NAFTA.

OSAP applications on the rise around Ontario

by Jill Mahoney
Charlatan Staff

An increase in the number of students applying for financial aid in Ontario and at Carleton seems to indicate that times are still tough for students.

There has been an increase of about 800 applications at Carleton to the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) from this time last year, says Carol Fleck, the university's director of student awards.

"Last year, we had about 6,200 applications, this year we have about 7,000," she says.

Students still have until Jan. 1 to apply to the provincial government for OSAP loans.

Fleck says she believes that after all applications have been received, there will be an increase of between 10 to 12 per cent over 1992.

"I think last year was about the same. We were running about 700 to 800 over the previous year (1991)."

The trend to more applications is not confined to Carleton alone.

"I don't know about each individual university, but I know that the total number of applications the ministry is processing has increased," says Fleck.

As of Sept. 20 last year, the student services branch of the Ministry of Education and Training had processed 153,000 OSAP applications. On the same date this year, 169,000 applications have been received.

The increased size of Carleton's 1993 first-year class may be affecting the numbers of OSAP applicants, says Bill Pickett, the university's director of the office of budget planning.

Pickett says 641 more students have entered first year at Carleton, representing an increase of about 11 per cent over September 1992.

"Certainly there's a connection because a good deal of students getting OSAP are in first year," he says. "So, everything else being equal, if first-year enrolment increases, you can expect OSAP applications to increase."

But Gary Anandasangaree, director of academics for the Carleton University Students' Association, says any kind of increase in OSAP applications is a sign students are in trouble.

He says there are several reasons why students can't afford to pay all the costs of their post-secondary education.

JOEL KENNETH GRANT

"This summer was one of the worst years for students to get a job. The ones some did get were very low-paying," says Anandasangaree.

Student unemployment in Ontario for May and June this year was 20 per cent in Ontario, according to the Canadian Federation of Students. In the summer of 1992, it was 20.3 per cent.

Karolina Strutek knows first-hand how hard it was to get a job this summer. She planted trees in May and June in Ontario, but when her contract ran out, she couldn't find work for the rest of the summer.

"That's why I applied for OSAP," she says. "If I'd gotten a job in those two months, I would have been able to pay my tuition."

Strutek, a second-year Carleton film studies student, says this was the first year she applied for OSAP. She received a loan of $1,400 that will keep her in school and also in debt to the government.

Anandasangaree also says many parents cannot afford to support their children in school, forcing them to apply for government loans to pay for their education.

Pickett agrees, saying that while the cost of education continues to rise, many people's incomes have remained stagnant. He also says the seven-per-cent tuition hike this year is a blow to students.

The burden of student debt has increased not only due to higher costs, but also because of the absence of student grants. Ontario's NDP government announced the elimination of the OSAP grant program last November.

Fleck says the government cut the OSAP grant program in order to save money, which left students with only interest-free loans for financial assistance. She says this has resulted in students requiring larger loan amounts instead of loan/grant combinations.

Anandasangaree says he feels the government is losing, not saving money. He says education fosters upward mobility and enables society to improve its infrastructure.

"Access to post-secondary education is restricted because of financial constraints," he says. "Education still continues to be for many people who do have money. It's an elite institution." □

Maclean's may use last year's data to rate CU

by Sara-Lynne Levine
Charlatan Staff

Carleton will be included in this year's Maclean's magazine university survey, but last year's data could be used to determine the university's new ranking.

Ann Dowsett Johnston, the magazine's assistant managing editor, says while a final decision has not been made, the magazine will probably use last year's figures on Carleton.

Last year, Maclean's ranked Carleton sixth out of 12 universities in a category which contained schools with comprehensive undergraduate and graduate programs. The year before, it was ranked 44th out of 46 universities, partly because of incorrect data submitted by Carleton.

On Sept. 16, Carleton announced it would not participate in this year's survey by refusing to provide the magazine with new data. The university cited financial reasons and a "lack of staff resources" for opting out of the survey.

Carleton spent a lot of time working on the social contract negotiations this summer and didn't want to use staff to collect data for the magazine's survey, says Pat O'Brien, director of public relations and information services. The social contract is the Ontario NDP government's plan to reduce public sector expenditures, including those by publicly funded universities.

O'Brien defended Carleton's decision. "We are not going to be dictated to by Maclean's," he says. "Since when did Maclean's become the dictatorial authority on ranking schools?"

O'Brien also says the university has never felt that the survey is methodically correct.

Dowsett Johnston says Carleton is the only university complaining about the cost of the survey.

"All Ontario universities faced the pressures of social contract negotiations this year," she says. "Why was Carleton University the only Ontario university to back out?"

She says the number of universities participating in this year's survey is up from last year, despite financial constraints. Several universities are participating this year, bringing the total number of universities to 49 from 45 in 1992.

Two other universities, the Montreal campus of the University of Quebec and Memorial University in St. John's, Nfld., also declined to participate this year.

Last week, Carleton President Robin Farquhar told The Charlatan the university would undertake an internal survey instead of compiling information for the magazine's ranking.

But Dowsett Johnston says the magazine is fulfilling a public demand for information. She says the process for collecting information and ranking the schools is a "very open exercise" where the magazine has "revealed the methodology and rating system."

The Maclean's university edition is one of the magazine's most popular issues, selling over 63,000 copies. Last year's issue was the second-highest seller of all time, behind the issue featuring former prime minister Pierre Trudeau talking about last year's referendum.

"Cynics say we are minting money, but I counter this by saying people need this information and are really serious about it."

Next fall, Maclean's will be publishing a guidebook to Canadian universities, she says. The book will feature two-page reviews of each Canadian university, including Carleton. □

Ottawa U. students stage "study-in"

by Clayton Wood
Charlatan Staff

Students at the University of Ottawa staged a "study-in" protest at a campus library last week to protest the reduction in the building's hours of operation.

Assistant director Leblanc talks to protestors in library.

On Sept. 22, about 150 students refused to leave the Morisset library at 10 p.m., the library's new closing time.

This summer, the university announced earlier closing times for the Morisset library, used primarily by students in arts and social sciences. Before, the library stayed open until midnight.

"It discriminates against part-time students. Many of them work full-time from nine to five and have classes from 7 to 10 p.m.," said Krista James, who helped organize the protest.

James, a fourth-year philosophy student, said this means part-time students will only have access to the library during the weekend. She said the university did a poor job of consulting students about the decision.

"Some people thought we were overreacting, but I felt we needed the study-in to get the attention of the administration."

The students at the protest remained in the library until midnight, then left without further incident, said James.

James also helped circulate a petition last week, which over 3,000 students signed.

Jean Leblanc, the assistant director of the library, met with the students during the protest. He said he sympathizes with them, but he has to deal with a $200,000 cut to the library's budget.

"I explained to them, 'I understand your problem, but the library has problems, too," said Leblanc.

On Sept. 22, protestors marched peacefully in downtown Montreal to protest a visit by right-wing municipal politicians from France. Members of Anti-Racist Action in Ottawa travelled to Montreal to join over 1,000 other people who marched between 7 and 8 p.m.

About 20 police cars patrolled the area of the protest, but director of police Gilles Dallaire said members of the French right-wing Front National party were never in the area.

A reduction in funds by the university meant several permanent staff had to be laid off, which resulted in the shorter hours of operation.

Carleton students speak out on the federal election

Once again, The Charlatan caught up with some students in front of the Unicentre to ask them for their point of view on the upcoming election.

But it seemed some of them had a greater interest in the free Cokes and Pop Tarts at the Campus Fest than discussing the future leadership of their country. Perhaps their reactions say something about the state of political leadership in Canada.

This is part two of our survey of students' opinions on the issues and personalities surrounding the 35th general election, set for Oct. 25.

What federal leader do you feel would best represent students' interests?

"I believe Jean Chrétien would be best to represent students' interest because if you look at the Tory government, they've cut OSAP grants. If you give the Liberals a chance maybe they can do something else."

Teaching the Educated to Read!

The main cause of student drop-out is stress — stress over not having assignments finished, stress over not staying "caught-up" with the class, and stress over the realization that just staying "caught-up" isn't going to be good enough.

1993 was the worst year in history for students getting jobs right out of college, and this next year looks even worse.

It isn't always the smartest students who get the best grades, but it is always the best readers — the ones who can get the most out of their books on their own.

Simply getting through your reading assignments will only give you the minimum that your professor requires to pass you. Just passing your courses isn't going to be good enough anymore.

In fact, having a diploma or a degree only allows you the opportunities of furthering your education with a more competitive group of fellow graduates.

The '90s will continue to be a decade filled with the most rapid change ever seen in history. Only those who are able to adapt to those changes will be able to remain competitive.

Being able to read all your reading assignments and additional reading selections with increased comprehension and recall will be a pre-requisite for anything you plan to do in the future.

The difference between a good mark and a great one will depend on your ability to read and learn on your own.

Power Reading is the Solution!

Power Reading is an eight-step video course that was developed on a college campus and initially designed for college students. With recent developments in video and computer graphics technologies, this course can now be offered on video, allowing you to learn in the privacy of your own home — at your own pace.

This course will absolutely at least double your reading speed with increased comprehension.

Intimidation in South African schools

by Denise Babin
The Link, Concordia University

JOHANNESBURG—Army dogs on the Wits University campus don't do algebra. They are trained to bite.

Trained to bite students who dare to challenge the racist administration.

Campus life in South Africa is nothing like in Canada. Of course, there are lectures and labs, beer-drinking contests and a chess club.

But tear gas and army tanks are as much part of student life as exams. Even the canine soldiers have marched many times over the football field, marking their territory.

Attending a Wits student council meeting is a challenge in itself. On Aug. 19, 116 students were arrested after the police and trained dogs surrounded their outdoor gathering and shoved as many as they could into a paddy wagon.

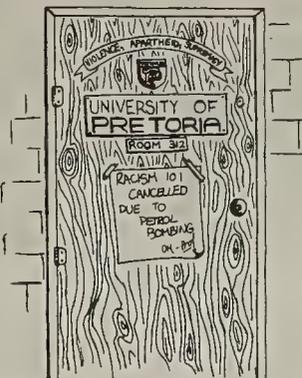

The students were released by three o'clock the next morning but more were arrested several days later and 130 students were in court Sept. 14 facing charges of public violence and contempt of court.

The students at the meeting were planning a series of actions, including a class boycott, to force the university administration to listen to their demands.

The first demand was the lifting of a Supreme Court injunction against any meeting of the South African Students Congress (SASCO) on campus. The second called for the disbanding of the undemocratic university council. None of the demands have been met.

SASCO is the principal student union in South Africa. Its goal is a non-sexist and democratic South Africa.

Students under the SASCO banners say the administration is a remnant of the apartheid education system and they want to change it. Apartheid education created separate schools and funding schemes for "blacks only" and "whites only" schools.

Only about 30 per cent of Wits students are black. Most of them are in the arts faculties, while only nine per cent of engineering and science students are black.

Some student activists at Wits think of their university council as a group of white people protecting their assets.

"The council met and believes it is, and will continue to be, a legitimate structure," said June Sinclair, the only woman on council. "We are representative of students' interests."

And Wits is considered to be a liberal, open university in the South African context.

The University of Pretoria, in the capital, is a breeding ground for young racist minds, despite the scrapping of apartheid laws that restricted access to the school to white people only. Apartheid is still the way of life there. More than 10,000 students live on campus yet only one residence houses black students. Black students have been threatened with violence and chased out of "whites only" residences.

"There's no rule telling us where we are supposed to stay," said one black student. "It's just a question of survival tactics."

The University of the North, or "Turloop," as it is called by the students, is built like a fort. Most buildings on campus have an outer wall with holes just the right size for the tip of an AK47.

The hill on the northern side serves as a watch tower. Barbed wire and high fences are everywhere. When things get bad, there's even tripwire.

"It has to be built like a fort," said Oscar, a student activist at Turloop and a SASCO member. "Our administration and our SRC (Student Representative Council) are democratic, and that scares the shit out of the government."

The South Africa Defence Force has an army base less than a kilometre away, just north of the main gates.

"When they come in looking for student activists, sometimes we run like hell. Other times, we shoot back," Oscar said.

Campus clubs yet to come together

by Ryan Nakashima
Charlatan Staff

The recent signing of a Palestinian-Israeli peace accord hasn't sparked friendship between the Jewish and Palestinian groups at Carleton.

Members of the Pro-Palestine Students' Association (PSA) and the Jewish Students' Union (JSU) say they can't officially support or oppose the agreement. But members of both groups weren't ready to call it a success.

"I don't know if it's going to work," says Rami Al-Hussieni, a PSA member. "I'm not against it. It's a step for peace. If it's going to work, we'll go for it. But I don't think so."

Dan Wolfish, community director of the JSU, described his reaction to seeing Yasser Arafat, the leader of the Palestine Liberation Organization, and Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, shake hands on the White House lawn.

"Amazement. Shock. Confusion. But happiness and hope. And fear. One day you wake up and you're in an emotional disagreement. The next day, you don't wake up in love."

The agreement calls for mutual recognition and limited Palestinian self-rule in the Israeli-occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip.

But there is still a difference of opinion in the clubs as to how the agreement should proceed.

Al-Hussieni says most of his relatives live in Palestine. To demonstrate where he meant, he took out the map of Israel, and indicated the entire region.

"That's our land. From the east to the west, and from the south to the north. That's my opinion."

Wolfish says the club's policy is to support the state of Israel. But he says it does not formulate views on particular policies, because it is a social club, not a political one.

"We are not the Israeli club, we're the Jewish club. That includes Israel, but it's not the limits of Judaism or the club," says Wolfish.

Dalia Diab, president of the PSA, says she believes the negotiations should, in the end, include debate over who owns Jerusalem.

The two Carleton groups have had their own disagreements in the past. In

Dan Wolfish

Dalia Diab

January, there was a demonstration by pro-Palestinian protesters at Carleton during Israel Day and Palestine Day.

Mirit Avram, a JSU member, says she remembers the RCMP presence, there to protect an Israeli embassy official who was speaking on campus for Israel Day.

The Charlatan reported that a brief shoving match took place between a Jewish student and a pro-Palestinian protester, after the protester's microphone was turned off during a question and answer period after the official's talk.

Shawn Rapley, then president of Carleton's undergraduate students' association, turned off the microphone because he said the "remarks became abusive."

"For both sides it was an emotional time," says Avram.

Members from the PSA and the JSU say there has been no enmity between the groups since the conflict. But they also say there is no real friendship.

Avram says she doesn't have any bad feelings towards the PSA students, but "I don't really know them. Not out of personal reasons. It just hasn't happened."

Diab says she sometimes exchanges a few words with people she recognizes from the JSU.

"I say 'Hi' and they say 'Hi,'" says Diab, although she says she doesn't know the JSU members by name. "I have nothing against the Jewish people personally."

After the conflict, the groups tried to meet formally, says Wolfish, but it was late in the second semester and time ran out before it actually happened. He says the groups have met in the past, however, but doesn't remember when.

The clubs were recently in close quarters, crammed among tables with other clubs and societies, during their drive for memberships in Baker Lounge and Porter Hall last week. But the atmosphere was more relaxed than during last year's protest.

At the event in Porter Hall, Wolfish blew his shofar, or ram's horn, as a symbol of peace, as part of the 10 days of celebrating the Jewish new year which began Sept. 16.

The sound could be heard throughout the hall. Fifteen feet away was the Pro-Palestine Students' Association, the Palestinian flag hanging from the front of the table. □

South Africa is transforming itself, slowly but surely. Apartheid laws were scrapped in February 1990 after intense pressure from groups like the African National Congress and from an international business and culture boycott. But laws are only one part of the racist regime.

The black majority in the country will vote in the national elections in April of next year. They will vote to change the government.

Maybe the education system will follow. People's minds will be the hardest to change. □

Voting's now in easy reach

If you are a Canadian citizen who will be 18 years of age or older on Election Day, you have the right to vote. But to exercise that right, your name must appear on the voters list.

The recently amended Canada Elections Act makes life simpler. First, revision of the voters list has been extended to give more voters, like yourself, the opportunity to be registered.

Next, the Special Ballot has been added, so now there's a new way to have your say by mail or in person.

To learn more, pick up the Elections Canada leaflet available at your Student Association, Registrar's Office or campus bookstore. Or call the number below.

"Free" costs more than it used to Students roamed from tent to tent, collecting free samples from various corporations at the Campus Fest carnival of promotions held outside the Unicentre Sept. 27 and 28.

It seems like a great deal with no strings attached — the companies want to give away free stuff and students are more than happy to take it. Generally, getting free stuff is fabulous, but just how "free" are all those samples?

When you consider the questionable records on human rights and the environment of some of the companies pitching their wares, it's debatable if their products are free at all.

Products given away at Campus Fest included Tampax tampons, Always maxi pads, Neilson Crunchie bars, Kellogg's Corn Pops and Pop Tarts, popcorn, Clover Leaf tuna, Apple computers, Edge Gel shaving foam and aftershave lotion, Coca Cola, Krunchers chips, Mennen speedstick deodorant, and countless others running contests with prizes from T-shirts to software packages.

The university bookstore sponsors the annual event. Bookstore manager Joe Gosset says Campus Fest '93 is a "gesture to students, a goodwill thing . . ." on behalf of the bookstore.

Some of the participating companies may be showing a lot of goodwill to students, but less so to the environment and foreign countries.

For example, Proctor and Gamble, the makers of Always maxi-pads, owns a pulp-processing plant in Salem, Florida. According to a December 1991 issue of the Multinational Monitor, dumping from that plant has virtually killed the Fenholloway River, choking it with grease, arsenic and dioxins. The pollution spills into the local water table as well as the Gulf of Mexico.

Joy Towles Cummings is the co-ordinator of Help Our Polluted Environment (HOPE), an organization committed to fighting pollution caused by Proctor and Gamble.

The Fenholloway, she says, is the only class five river in the United States, meaning that the amount of pollutants in it are virtually unlimited. She says in Salem, Florida where she lives, the rate of leukaemia is twice as high as normal.

Just to add to the list of corporate offenders:

Coca-Cola has investments in Indonesia, a country which has violated mandates handed down by the United Nations to pull its troops out of East Timor and stop the genocide of the people there.

Tampons have been linked to toxic shock syndrome, a condition which can result in damage to the major organs and even death.

Campus Fest seems like a simple concept: students get something for nothing. The companies want to promote their products in the hopes of making you look twice at them in the grocery or department store.

Next time you're out shopping, look again.

Try to see more than the products on the shelves and think about what they may represent: suffering for people, animals and the environment. Happy Campus Fest.

What the poster didn't say by Jason T. Ramsay

Jason Ramsay is a second-year masters psychology student who is telling of his friend's sexual assault experience with her permission.

I am too angry not to write.

My friend was working late one Saturday night on Sept. 4 in the computer lab located at Loeb C460. She found herself in that empty lab at 10 at night because she could not send electronic mail to her colleagues from the computer in her graduate lab.

There was nobody in the lab, or in the lab across the hall. The building was deserted. No people, no Foot Patrol. Not even a trickle of sound from the people in the graduate computing lab a few footfalls down the corridor.

She was alone, but she wasn't nervous. As a graduate student she was used to the long nightly hours spent at the computer, processing data in order to leave the day free for classes and school work. With a bottle of Evian and a computer, she would work for hours.

That night, she glanced casually at the orange and white safety poster on the lab door. It told about a man exposing himself to two women as they worked in that very lab on June 18, grabbing one and then fleeing.

She had nothing to fear, she thought. There were people just down the hall.

She would only be there for a few minutes. And besides, he just exposed himself. What were the chances? She was almost done.

And then he appeared. Naked but for gym shoes. She said he looked like a National Lampoon photo. But the caricature growled: "I want to fuck you."

Not cartoon like. Fierce. Horrid. He grabbed her on the shoulders, his thumbs digging into the hollow beneath her collarbones. She twisted, bolted for the door. He grabbed her, crucified her against the door frame. No personal space. Breathing too close and clutching hands. Thank God she had that big leather belt on — he wanted her shorts off — no, his hands were somewhere else. Scream, twist, kick, grunt.

Swearing, Jesus Christ, she couldn't help but look at his face. But that was good — identify the bastard. Oh shit, his nails were scraping her thighs. Kicking wherever. His hissing breath.

And then enough, without warning, he gave up, he was gone. Where the fuck did he come from? Ran back to her lab, shivering, elated it was over. Bolted into the room like a spooked deer. What happened? How long? Two, five minutes. Christ, who to call . . .

The second wave of trauma came when she stopped in front of the safety poster a few days later. The date and time of night was correct, but she wondered: "Is this the poster about my attack?"

After hours of questioning by Carleton's department of university safety and the Ottawa Police, what she considered a vicious and deliberate attempt at sexual assault had become almost a non-event.

She stared at the poster in disbelief, thinking she had missed something. She hadn't, but the publishers of the poster had.

Why did the poster euphemize the attack with phrases like: "The female was grabbed several times before the male fled?" In essence, the poster was a lie.

The lie was extended when The Charlatan, having only the poster to go on, reported it as another "flashing" incident. Without her consent, her experience had been taken from her and turned into something less disturbing, less alarming.

Her concerns are larger now. How will the campus at large respond if the truth is not made public? The administration has played its hand by playing down the attack with a euphemized poster. If there is no information, there is no danger. Ignorance is blissful, until the "flasher" breaks character, pins you to the wall, and tries to rip your clothes off.

Perhaps the reports on the preceding posters went through the same "soft censorship." If this is the case, then she wonders whether a more descriptive poster would have led her to take extra precautions. "Definitely yes" she concludes.

It is time that administration starts dealing with the prevalence of sexual assault in an accurate manner. Until then, the campus population will have no cause for alarm. We can handle the truth. We are university-educated adults.

LETTERS

Just a nice bunch of guys

Editor:
This letter is being written in response to a paragraph found in Rori Caffrey's article ("Enjoying your orientation," The Charlatan, Sept. 2, 1993).

In the article Caffrey writes:
"Despite their homoerotic initiation rites and Greek brotherhood overtones, fraternities are bad news. Generally, they're not gay-positive. Avoid them like the plague."

It has been said that ignorance breeds contempt. Caffrey has given us the quintessential example supporting this theory. Caffrey writes that fraternities should be avoided like the plague. Perhaps if he had taken the time to stop by a chapter house, or attend an event, he would be in a better position and able to avoid making such libellous comments.

Caffrey and The Charlatan might have considered the fact that libel and slander are punishable by law. Severe penalties for such careless journalism have long been established to protect the integrity and reputation of all organizations.

Over the years, Sigma Pi Fraternity has helped the Ottawa community in many ways: annual work with the Multiple Sclerosis society, volunteering time with senior citizen residences and food drives for the Ottawa Food Bank.

Sigma Pi Fraternity is one of many Greek groups helping in the community. If one were to look at the complete work of Greek groups as a whole, it would be far from possible to label fraternities as "bad."

Any responsible non-fiction writer strives for veracity. With no clue as to the operation of a fraternity, Caffrey has made himself a fiction writer and The Charlatan has been reduced to little more than a cheap tabloid.

In future, Caffrey and The Charlatan should consider whether or not they are printing fact or fiction. They should also consider whether or not they are being defamatory.

In response to the letter in last week's Charlatan about our efforts to rename the Unicentre after Dan Aykroyd, I would agree that Pauline Jewett deserves to have a building named after her.

However, the Unicentre is dedicated to student life and Jewett had little to do with Carleton student life, which is why the referendum likely failed.

If the university wants to honor Jewett, it would perhaps be more fitting to rename the administration building after her. (Universities, however, usually like to reserve such honors for people who contribute a million dollars or more.)

By contrast, Aykroyd's time at Carleton embodies the ideals of university student life. He was an excellent student who got involved with CKCU and Sock 'N' Buskin to refine his comedy and acting talents. It was these extra-curricular activities which brought him to the attention of Toronto's Second City comedy troupe, which lured him out of Carleton, and the rest is history.

Some careers require a university degree, others don't. I think it's safe to say that, as an Academy Award-nominated actor, the hours Aykroyd spent refining his craft in the Unicentre were valuable and educational. Naming the building after him would be a fitting example to future generations of students. A large portion of the university community seems to agree, as we already have more than 2,000 student signatures calling for the name change.

Clayton Wood's experience with the Canadian health care system failed to evoke much sympathy on my part ("Health System Needs Help," The Charlatan, Sept. 23, 1993).

Here is why. Wood's appeal for justice is that a prosperous Canadian, namely himself, should be getting what he wants, when he wants it. The crux of his argument is basically as follows: "I should be able to get it done (the eye operation) when it's convenient for me." In other words, since the external world does not coincide with his wishes, it should be adjusted accordingly.

Frankly, I am getting tired of this solipsistic, this-world-is-my-idea kind of attitude regarding social programs. The world that Mr. Wood proposes is one where rights correspond to one's wealth which is, no doubt, not the kind of world which most Canadians would envision as fair.

The reason Wood feels that a socialized-style health care system doesn't work is because people are forced to give up a "precious freedom," in that people such as himself "are prohibited from spending their money on a higher level of service." Let's take a closer look at what Wood's loss of "precious freedom" actually means.

In reality, buying his turn means that another person, one who lacks similar financial means, has to give up his or her turn and consequently wait that much longer. Seen in this light, the freedom of the majority of Canadians would be affected negatively by adding this sort of selectivity to the medical system.

Wood fails to generate much sympathy, as in essence he is lamenting the fact that the Canadian health system discriminates against everyone equally, including the rich.

Why does our CUSA president get $18,000 a year when tuition fees are on the rise, most students don't have jobs and most parents of students are losing their jobs?

Not so long ago I phoned the prestigious CUSA office to speak to the $18,000 woman and I was told she had gone home. If she had gone home, fine, because I don't expect her to live in her office — it can get quite stuffy in there.

The thing is, I know she was there because I was at the CUSA office less than five minutes before my phone call. Upon hearing about the absence of my president, being only two minutes away, I ran back to the CUSA office. Low and behold, to my surprise (and hers, too), there she was watching TV with her comrades.

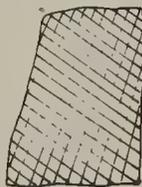

I had only wanted to speak to her about a small problem. It would have taken her less than two minutes to speak to me, but, oh no, my problem was dismissed as irrelevant before it was even heard.

I would expect this behavior from anyone, even myself when I am at home watching my own TV, but not from a person who gets paid to handle student concerns.

Now that I know I pay for our president's salary, when I phone to speak to the Lucy, give her the damn phone please.

Charlatan Staff

Maybe you've only had sex once, or maybe you've been active for 20 years. Maybe you were irresponsible or maybe your birth control failed. Every experience is different. But regardless of the situation, it's the same initial sinking feeling and tightness in the chest as you sit in a tiny office or sterile examining room and the nurse tells you you're pregnant. What are you going to do?

"They (the women who find out they are pregnant) are pretty fragile, emotionally vulnerable, the emotions all play into it," says Frances McEvoy, a nurse on staff at Carleton University's Health Services.

"You sit down (with the women) for a long time because actually, the person does not want to move most of the time. It's too much of a shock. They want to know what's next."

Women have three options. They can carry the pregnancy to term and keep the child, give the child up for adoption, or choose to have an abortion.

Abortions are performed at three hospitals in Ottawa: the Civic, the Riverside, the Queensway-Carleton, and at a clinic in Hull.

But a "Needs and Assessment Report" on abortion services in Eastern Ontario, released in February and drawn from the Ontario Ministry of Health data for 1990 and 1991, found that about 500 women travelled to Toronto and Montreal from the Ottawa area for abortions during those two years.

The report also found a shortage of physicians willing to perform abortions in Eastern Ontario. According to the report, the shortage is reaching crisis proportions as gynecologists who perform abortions retire or change their practices.

Based on this report, plans for an abortion clinic in the Ottawa area to service Eastern Ontario were announced by Ontario's health minister Ruth Grier last July.

Proposals for a clinic have to be submitted by applicants by Oct. 8, to be reviewed by a Ministry of Health evaluation committee and the district health councils in Eastern Ontario.

Because the deadline for applications hasn't passed, the Ministry of Health is not able to name applicants or talk about any of the proposals.

Vera Hrebacka, a member of the Pro-Choice Network, says her organization exists to work towards making abortion services available to women and to guarantee their reproductive freedom.

The organization started the campaign for an abortion clinic in Ottawa a little over a year ago, when it discovered Dr. Henry Morgentaler had proposed a clinic in the Ottawa area in 1991.

"It wasn't the bureaucrats who gave us the clinic," says Denise Lachance, another member of the Pro-Choice Network. "It was the women and men who organized and fought for it."

The women and men of the Pro-Choice Network fought for a clinic because they saw there was a desperate need for one.

"The many tests involved and the length between appointments can cause women to wait an average of five weeks or longer for a hospital abortion," says Christine Fretwell, another member of the Pro-Choice Network.

Catherine Colombo, assistant to the medical director of the Morgentaler Clinic in Toronto, says women who attend her clinic do not experience a long wait.

"An appointment can be made within the week," says Colombo. "The procedure can be a one-time affair unless the woman wishes to have counselling before, and if she wishes there is free counselling after."

Lachance says a long wait is unacceptable, because it is more dangerous to have an abortion later in a pregnancy and because women can't have an abortion after 20 weeks in Canada.

But Sue Hierlihy, public affairs director of the Campaign for Life Coalition, does not agree.

"Hospitals offer more safeguards," she says. "Often women complain about the time lag but perhaps this may give them more time to seek help, to see if other solutions can solve the problems they will experience carrying the child to term."

Another problem is with the anaesthetic used, according to the Pro-Choice Network. In hospitals, many women are put to sleep with a general anaesthetic, while in many situations only a local anaesthetic is needed.

"The abortion itself is a short procedure which lasts only five to 10 minutes," says Colombo. "Often, depending on the person, it can take a woman 24 to 48 hours to recover from a general anaesthetic."

Hrebacka says general anaesthetics are more expensive than local ones and not necessary for women who are healthy.

"What happens is that women often go through a gynecologist, who books operating room time at a hospital to perform the procedure," says Hrebacka. "Here is where the general anaesthetic is used."

Colombo says her clinic never puts anyone to sleep with a general anaesthetic, but uses a local anaesthetic which freezes the area instead.

At a clinic, a woman is usually offered a choice of two drugs: One is Sublimaze, a pain-killer. The other is nitrous oxide gas, which helps her to relax.

During an actual abortion, the cervical opening is dilated. Then "curettage," a gentle wiping of the uterus, is followed by suction. If the cervix doesn't dilate easily, "laminaria," which are like toothpicks of seaweed, are inserted to gently dilate the opening.

Because of the simplicity of the procedure, Lachance says hospital abortions are unnecessarily taking up time in the operating room.

"This is time which could otherwise be used for people who are sick," she says. "Plus the hospitals are more expensive, so a clinic would be a better health dollar option."

Hrebacka explained that there is more involved in hospital abortions because they are large institutions.

"There are many more steps to getting anything done in a hospital, for example dealing with admitting and booking," she says. "A clinic is cheaper just by virtue of being smaller."

Hrebacka also said the general anaesthetic was also a significant factor in the expense of a hospital abortion.

"A general anaesthetic means two doctors must be present because it must be administered by an anaesthetist."

Lachance says women also prefer clinics over hospitals, because some of the staff at hospitals can come across as anti-choice.

"In the hospitals the staff rotates so if a person is assigned to care giving for an abortion they can't say 'don't put me there because of my political views,'" says Fretwell. "But the woman has obviously made up her mind to get that far. Questioning her judgment undermines her viewpoint. It takes the decision process away from her."

The Charlatan sought a comment from hospitals on these complaints, but those called either could not or would not release information surrounding abortions.

Colombo says the principle embraced by the Toronto clinic staff is that women have a freedom to choose.

"At the clinic you get as much support as you need," she says. "No one here perceives you've done anything wrong."

But Hierlihy says she believes clinics do not require women to think or be counselled enough on their decision.

"Women have abortions because they feel they can't carry the child to term," she says, adding that clinic counselors may not present them with all their options.

But for women who do choose to have an abortion, a clinic in Ottawa will probably make things a little easier.

Two women who have had abortions shared their experiences with The Charlatan on the condition of anonymity. They answered an advertisement on a bulletin board asking for their experiences and opinions about a new clinic. These cases are individual and do not speak for the experiences of all women who seek abortions at hospitals or clinics.

Lena is a 21-year-old Carleton student.

I would have to go to a hospital to have an abortion. I was pregnant other than Lena says she went to a gynecologist and then a hospital. At each step in the process she had to have an internal examination — where the cervix is dilated and the woman is checked to make sure there are not any abnormalities like bumps or cysts in her uterus — before she could proceed to the next.

asked a

Are You Pregnant?

Lena says she first became pregnant because she was not practising safe sex, but then became pregnant a second time while she was on the pill. She sought another abortion within seven months of the first.

Lena says she felt the hospital was busier this time. She says before the operation, the porter wheeled her bed into the hallway leading to the operating room, where she had to wait alone for about 10 minutes. She says it was a long time she had to think about getting up and running away.

I had overheard someone say they were supposed to do five that day. Because of that, I didn't trust them to give me special care. I felt they wanted me out of there quick. I could overhear them talking about me. The doctor wanted me to go home but the nurse was saying no. I was sent home with instructions. I went straight to bed."

According to Fretwell and Lachance, the atmosphere of being on an "assembly line" is not uncommon for women who have hospital abortions.

Lena talked about a sense of "lurch" after her first abortion. "When you go home you are not a part of anything anymore. If something happens, you go to emergency like everyone else."

After her first abortion she experienced a fever and chills which were soon cleared up by antibiotics. The side effects of her second experience were more serious.

needed to make sure the infection would not return. I finally so disillusioned I went to (another) hospital where I had a new gynecologist who was wonderful. She made me stay for just two weeks and gave me a lot of antibiotics; but in the end Lena's story is exceptional because she experienced severe complications. Although a hospital would not comment, Colombo says incomplete abortions, while extremely rare, are the most common complication that happens.

Lena has a few suggestions about what she would like to see in a clinic. She says she didn't like being put to sleep and found the waking up a bit traumatic. Also, she says she would have liked a more supportive atmosphere.

Lena says she felt it was important to tell women they have the right to ask for antibiotics after the procedure to fight possible infection.

"The doctors don't have to give it to you but you do have a right to ask."

Kari is a 17-year-old Carleton student who had an abortion at a clinic in Toronto when she was 13. She found out about the clinic through a classmate.

When I did go (to the clinic) I saw a counsellor right away. They were leery because of my age and they wanted me to tell my parents but I was adamant that I wouldn't. They gave me my main options. I was the one who brought up the possibility of abortion. The only time I had second thoughts was when I had the sound: I heard the heartbeat and I found out it was a girl. I took a long time to decide. Finally I sat down and listed out all the pros and cons on paper. The procedure itself was very simple. Everything was explained beforehand and carried out like I explained. They didn't put me to sleep like I had expected before. I had a feeling of something leaving my body. Not just physically, but emotionally as well."

Kari says the option of abortion was not pushed on her by the clinic counsellor.

The one thing Kari did not like about the clinic was the waiting room.

"I would rather not sit and wait in a waiting room. If you have the appointment you should just get right into the procedure," she says. "I would prefer not to see people during the procedure. I think when you're at the clinic you just want to get it over and done with."

Kari says if she were to be in the same situation now that she is older, she would probably decide not to abort.

I always think of what a baby would've looked like and how it would've affected your life in a positive way. I've had a lot of thoughts about having a baby, but I am a very practical person. I would never go through with a pregnancy for nine months to give the baby away and I would never keep a baby if it wasn't realistically and financially feasible. Now it has been seven years and I don't think I'd have an abortion now if I were pregnant. Now I do value life. But you can't think You're pregnant. What are you going to do?

Although a new abortion clinic may not take away the anxiety you may feel when faced with this decision, it may make sure you have easier access to all of your options.

"Make sure you have somebody — a good sounding board around you, somebody you can trust, willing to listen, be non-judgmental," says McEvoy. "Your decision is yours and yours alone and ultimately the consequences are yours no matter which way you go."

Toronto sings the soccer blues

Ravens ranked second in country after strong win

by Sarah Richards
Charlatan Staff

Toronto may have the Blue Jays baseball team, but Carleton has the Ravens men's soccer team.

And when it comes to winning, the Ravens are proving to be just as successful as their feathered friends.

Carleton 2 Toronto 0

The Carleton men's soccer team beat the University of Toronto Varsity Blues 2-0 on Oct. 25, improving their record to an undefeated 4-0.

"(Toronto) just didn't seem motivated -- I don't think they like playing the tough teams," said Raven goalkeeper Stevie Ball. Besides the polished goaltending of Toronto's George Radan, the Blues put on a somewhat lacklustre performance. They were unable to penetrate Carleton's defence in the first half despite having a strong wind at their back.

It was Carleton that came closest to scoring, when at 20 minutes, defenceman Earl Cochrane's shot chipped the bottom of Toronto's crossbar. The ball wobbled on the goal line, but crowding around the net prevented Raven forward Naoki Ogasawara from tapping it in. The teams were left scoreless at halftime.

Offensively, the Basil Phillips-John Lauro combination has provided excellent Raven scoring chemistry early in the season. That continued against Toronto. When the first goal of the game was posted in the second half, the two forwards were the initiators.

"John kicked a through ball over (the Toronto defenceman's) head. I ran in behind the defender, got the ball, took a couple of touches and hit it into the far corner," said Phillips.

The Toronto goalkeeper was left with little chance to make a save.

Solid defence allowed Carleton's goalkeeper Ball to avoid any major confrontations during the game. But when he tations during the game. But when he was called upon to make a spectacular save, he rose to the occasion.

Raven Ian Roe brought down a Blues player in Ball's goaltender box and the Blues were awarded a penalty kick.

"It was a fifty-fifty call. It was kind of an awkward call," said Ball.

The waist-high shot was stopped by Ball, who correctly guessed to dive to his right.

"Everyone told me... that they thought he was going the other way and I sort of thought he was too, but I don't change my mind," said Ball of his decision.

A fatal mistake by Toronto's defence eliminated any chances of a Blues comeback. Cochrane was left unmarked on the far goal post despite the calls of the

Rugby team demolishes Brock in win

by Matt Shurrie
Charlatan Staff

If you can't find the Brock Badgers rugby team, go look under a rock.

After the humiliating 50-0 beating they received from the Raven men's rugby team at Carleton on Sept. 25, there's no other place they could be.

Carleton 50 Brock 0

With the victory, the Ravens improved to 2-0 and remain tied with Royal Military College atop the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's second rugby division.

"The team was impressive, and I noticed a change in attitude," said coach Lee Powell. "It was very evident there was a high level of intensity and a desire to win."

All-star kicker Mike Rys led the team with an incredible 23 points on two tries, five converts and a penalty kick.

"The fullbacks played at the level we think they can and the rookies continue to shine," Rys said modestly.

Aside from Rys, much of the Ravens' success could also be attributed to new game strategy, said coach Powell.

"We were able to incorporate new techniques with added twists," he said.

The Ravens soared above the crowd in their game against Brock.

Of these new strategies, a fullback pass fake was the most successful because it created a hole for the fullback to run through.

Raven fullback Bruce Maxwell used the play to perfection, scoring two tries.

Carleton dominated Brock in the first half, building a 26-0 halftime lead. The second half was a repeat of the first, highlighted by missed opportunities for Brock and a continued Carleton offensive onslaught.

Although Brock threatened early in the second half to break the shutout moving the ball downfield into scoring position, Raven defence held them back.

Then Raven players Sam Mancuso and Rick Haldane broke out. Relying on the pass fake technique, both scored a try a piece. Mancuso had an excellent 20-yard run for a score. Following him, Haldane was able to fake out the Badgers and run 30 yards for another score.

In other rugby action, the rugby Ravens' second team defeated Bishop's second team by a score of 27-9.

"The second team is moving along very well, making it very difficult choosing players to move up and down," said coach Powell.

RANT 'N' RAVEN

The difference a year makes

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

Excuse me.

But is this Carleton University?

You know, the university the worst sports teams in the country call home? The place where the losers live? Some team called the Ravens? Because if it is I'm a mighty confused puppy -- 'cause I can't seem to find them anymore.

Glancing at this year's first-month Raven results in comparison to the same figures recorded last year, shows something previously only dreamed about in recent years -- improvement among Carleton teams.

Well almost -- let's take a look at the difference a year makes.

In men's soccer, after their first four games, last year's Ravens were in second place in their OUAA east division with a 3-1 record. Later on in the season they'd move into the national rankings peaking at the number five spot. Not bad. Not bad at all. Tough to improve on that, one would think.

Uh-huh. This year after four games, the men's soccer team is sitting pretty with a tidy 4-0 record, they're first in their division, and the CIAU already has them ranked as the second best team in the country.

In women's soccer, the Ravens were fourth in their OWIAA east division after three games last season with a 1-2 record.

This year the record remains the same but they've allowed eight fewer goals. Last year's team allowed 12 goals in their first three games. This year's they've reduced that figure to four. For the women's soccer team, the improvement's not in the actual results, but the margin of victory.

Nowhere is this turnaround of Raven fortunes more noticeable than in the football team. Last year's woeful squad staggered through their first three games compiling a 0-3 record, bringing up the rear in the O-QIFC the entire season. After just three games they'd already given up 121 points and had only managed to score 14 themselves.

What a difference a year makes.

This year's squad is sitting third in the O-QIFC after three games with a 2-1 record. They've halved their points against to 60 and scored 61.

Then there's the rugby team. Last year's club was alone in first in the OUAA rugby second division with a 2-0 record. Déjà vu. Last year's club posts the same record. So it's not an improvement, but it's not a decline either now, is it?

Finally we come to the women's field hockey team -- the deviant one in this month's positive curve.

Last year's club posted a 2-1-2, fourth-place record after five games. This year's team is currently sitting seventh after seven games with a 1-4-2 record. Less wins. More losses. So they're not perfect. I'm willing to forget.

Because this is Carleton University. Where some team called the Ravens is reversing long-standing past trends.

This month anyway.

Vanier Cup champs humbled by Ravens

Football team registers another comeback

by Derek DeCioet
Charlatan Staff

As the Carleton Ravens left the field on Sept. 25, one thing was apparent to the fans at Kingston's Richardson Stadium.

A new era had arrived for Carleton football.

Carleton 25 Queen's 20

Backed by a strong running game and a sterling second-half defence, the Ravens shocked the Queen's Golden Gaels, last year's Vanier Cup champion.

It wasn't easy. In what is becoming a weekly occurrence, the Ravens fell behind early, and had to scramble back from a 17-3 halftime deficit.

"We just kept plugging away like we have in our other two games," said starting quarterback Sean O'Neill, who was replaced by backup Shawn Thompson at the start of the third quarter. "We just kept scoring and it seemed like it wouldn't stop."

"I think it shows that we've got a lot of character in us," said Thompson of the comeback. "There's no death in us. We never give up."

The workhorse for the Ravens' offence was running back David Bosveld, who amassed 145 yards on 29 carries. He scored one touchdown on a 20-yard pass from Thompson and ran for two more — including a 35-yard TD rush in the fourth quarter, to put the Ravens ahead 21-20.

"He read the holes well, and the offensive line made some big holes for him," said Thompson.

Defensively, the Ravens buckled down and shut down Brad Elberg, the Gaels' star running back, in the second half.

Elberg, an all-Canadian last year, opened the scoring less than three minutes into the game with an 85-yard touchdown pass from quarterback Steve Othen. But the Ravens contained Elberg after that, holding him to 99 yards rushing and no touchdowns.

"In the first half... we kind of dragged him down, we kind of chased him down, but we didn't tackle him," said Raven defensive back Jason Mallett. "In the second half, we made some hits. We let him know we were ready to play the game."

"We had people in Brad Elberg's face," said Raven coach Donn Smith. "(Linebackers) Joey Ducharme and Hubie Hiltz were really smacking him.

"I wouldn't say we stopped him, but we did minimize him."

It was another indication of how far the Ravens have come since last year, when Elberg romped for 145 yards and four touchdowns in a 43-3 rout.

With solid defence, the Ravens were able to trap the Gaels in their own territory, creating better field position for the offence.

"We had good field position all second half," said Thompson. "It seemed like even when we didn't score, we were moving the ball."

O'Neill struggled in the first half, completing just four of 11 passes behind an erratic offensive line. But he, not Thompson, will start against Bishop's on Oct. 2, said Smith.

"I think it will be a boost for Sean O'Neill to know we have that backup (in Thompson)," said Smith.

Smith said Queen's may have underestimated the Ravens' comeback ability.

"I think Queen's probably felt... in the back of their mind that it was pretty well out of reach for us," he said.

O'Neill, meanwhile, thinks the Ravens' days as a laughing stock in the Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference are over.

"Now they'll take us for real," he said. "That's for sure." □

Lacrosse club falls short in high-scoring shootout

by Ryan Ward
Charlatan Staff

What a downer.

The Carleton lacrosse club lost a close, late 6-5 decision to last year's lacrosse champion Brock Badgers on Sept. 25 at Brewer Park.

Brock 6 Carleton 5

"It was just a downer," said co-captain Wayne Paddick. "We fought so hard, scored a goal in the fourth quarter to tie, and then they scored the winner."

It was a difficult loss to swallow precisely for that reason — the Ravens could have pulled off an upset victory.

"It was not a very highly skilled game," said Paddick. "It was just full of sloppy play. We just had a whole bunch of missed opportunities that we should have done something with."

Carleton opened the scoring in the first quarter but trailed 3-2 at halftime.

The third quarter was a story of déjà vu as Carleton stormed back to tie the game at three. And then again at four. And then again at five. And then... Brock finally ended the seesaw match with a cheap goal late in the game.

"It infuriated me," said co-captain Brye Briggs. "They pretty well did what we wanted to do — shoot the puck. If we had taken more shots I'm sure we could have turned the game around."

Scoring for Carleton were midfielder Greg Moroski, attack Steve Simenovic with two and attack Dan McWhirter with the other pair.

The lacrosse club will play its next games on the weekend in Guelph Oct. 2 and Hamilton Oct. 3 against the Gryphons and Marauders. □

QUOTE OF THE WEEK

"We're averaging an ambulance a game."

Women's soccer coach Dave Kent on the injuries plaguing his team.

CHEERS AND JEERS

Cheers to freshman running back David Bosveld who was named the O-QIFC player of the week after his heroics in Carleton's 25-20 victory over the Queen's Golden Gaels. Bosveld caught a 20-yard pass for a touchdown and rushed for two more. In total, he carried the ball 29 times for 145 yards rushing, averaging 5 yards per carry.

Jeers to McGill defensive lineman John Pevac for testing positive for stanozolol after an unscheduled doping test was conducted after a Sept. 1 practice, the Ottawa Citizen reported earlier this week. Pevac was suspended for four years and had until Sept. 29 to appeal the decision.

CALENDAR

Friday Oct. 1.

FIELD HOCKEY - The women's field hockey team will travel to Kingston looking to improve on their 1-4-2 record against the 3-4 Queen's Golden Gaels in a 1:30 p.m. match.

Saturday Oct. 2.

RUGBY - The rugby team will travel to Peterborough to take on the Trent Excalibur on Trent Field at 1 p.m.

SOCCER - The Carleton men's soccer team will travel to York University looking to improve on their 4-0 record against the York Yeomen in a 1 p.m. game at the North York Civic Stadium.

The women's soccer team will follow with a 3 p.m. match against the York Yeowomen's team.

FOOTBALL - The surprising 2-1 Ravens football team will host the conference-leading Bishop's Gaîtlers on Raven Field at 1 p.m. Tickets are $2 for students with ID cards and $4 for all others.

WATERPOLO - The men's water polo team opens its season in Kingston with a game against the Queen's Golden Gaels at 12:30 p.m.

Sunday, Oct. 3

SOCCER - The men's soccer team concludes its road trip with a 1 p.m. game against the Ryerson Rams.

The women's team will follow with a 3 p.m. game against the Ryerson Lady Rams. □

Women's soccer looking for offence

One goal in three games

by Bram S. Aaron

Where, oh where, has the offence gone?

The Carleton Ravens women's soccer team lost 3-0 to the University of Toronto Blues on Sept. 25, dropping their season record to 1-2.

True to early season form, the Raven defence excelled while the Raven offence disappeared.

Toronto 3 Carleton 0

"Our defence looks strong, said co-captain Mary McCormick. "And when (defender Stacey) Doherty comes back we'll be even stronger." Doherty suffered an eye injury a week ago in a match against the Ryerson Rams and likely won't rejoin the team until mid-October.

But in the meantime, offensive changes are necessary, said coach David Kent.

"We have to change the system so that, without sacrificing defence, we can shoot some balls at their net," he said.

How that is to be accomplished remains to be seen.

Against Toronto, an early goal by the Blues set the tone for the entire game.

"We had good spirits going into the game, but after they scored their first goal, we went downhill and lost morale," said McCormick. "We were all disappointed."

"We played well in the first half," said Kent. "But they're (Toronto) a strong, explosive team. In the second half they slowed us down because they were able to keep the pressure up and we weren't able to stay with them."

Aggressive play by Toronto and a lack of intensity by Carleton was another contributing factor in the Raven loss.

"They (Toronto) played physical for the whole 90 minutes, and we only played for 60," said Kent.

The Blues scored twice in the second half, including a goal on a penalty kick, to seal the victory.

Despite the loss, there were positive signs of improvement, said Kent. Goalkeeper Kristina Bacchi was solid in net. Midfielder Corrine van Ryckde Groot was a lone aggressive force and defender Sarah Richards provided strong defence.

Rookie play was another plus, said Kent.

"We have 11 rookies on this team and we're holding our own and improving at the same time," he said. "That's a tremendous accomplishment." □

Rys-ing to the occasion simple for Rys

Rugby team captain hoping to lead Ravens to playoff berth

by Josée Bellemare
Charlatan Staff

He wears a black shirt, faded after three years on the rugby squad, and almost every afternoon of the week, in a cold September wind, you can spot him wearing that shirt on the rugby field.

He's Mike Rys and it could be argued he's the Carleton rugby team's most valuable player.

"If he were to leave the team, we would lose 80 per cent of our energy," says rugby coach Lee Powell. "Over the past four years, the energy he's shown, tied in with his maturity towards how the game is played, has made him an excellent player."

That energy, maturity and all-round excellence are what make him such an imposing offensive force.

Just look at these figures:

-- 11 points in a 35-6 trouncing over Trent University in league action two years ago.

-- 11 points in a 11-0 victory last year over the Royal Military College Redmen.

-- and just this past Saturday, Rys accounted for a career high: 23 points in a 50-0 thrashing of the Brock Badgers.

For numbers like these, and others like them, Rys was finally rewarded last year when he was named to the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's rugby all-star team.

Sports for Rys started early when his father played with him as a child. Hockey. Football. Soccer. If it was a sport, he played it.

And as grew up in a Walkerton, a small town two hours north of Toronto, under his father's watchful eye he began developing the powerful kick playing soccer which makes him such an integral part of the rugby Ravens' offence.

"I developed my kicking when I was young," he says. "My father was a very big influence on my life."

Soccer, however, fell by the wayside, as did his desire to play football when Rys entered the local high school.

Football wasn't offered. Rugby was.

"It's a different style of game because you're playing without equipment," he says, commenting on the difference between the two sports. "You don't have the rests like you do in football. And if there's a scrum, there's a lot of times you get kicked and pushed around."

Despite the bruises and punishment, Rys realized right away he loved rugby.

"It's more of a team sport — you can't be by yourself, you have to count on everybody else," he says.

It may be a team sport, but Rys is the undisputed team leader. And that means work.

"Mike is a vital part of this team," says Raven centre André Mihelic. "He's a motivator — a hard-nosed player."

He practises constantly. Before games. After games. With the team. Alone. Even during the summer when rugby is not in season, Rys says he practised twice a week.

"I make every effort possible to make every game and practice," he says. "I feel if I'm missing practices, I'm cheating myself by not being there."

Besides rugby, if there is such a thing for the fourth-year student, 22-year-old Rys is finishing off a sociology degree -- a goal he's learned the importance of.

"In my first year, I felt my schooling was hurt," he says, referring to his less than stellar grades. "I learned that I have

"If he were to leave the team, we would lose 80 per cent of our energy."

Coach Lee Powell

to balance them equally.

"If I want good marks, I have to put a lot of time into it. If I want to be a good player, I have to put a lot of time into it."

Now Rys is putting time into another goal — a playoff berth for the rugby team in the second division of OUAA rugby.

At the centre of every huddle, that's where you'll find rugby Raven Mike Rys.

Two years ago, the Ravens finished third in their division. Last year, they moved up to second. Neither was good enough for a playoff berth. Only the first-place team moves on to the playoffs against the top three teams of the first division.

"In the last couple of years, there were a lot of disappointments," Rys says. "I get disappointed because everybody works hard."

But maybe with Rys in charge, things will be different this year.

"The main goal is to win this season," he says. "You take the good with the bad and hopefully this year, we'll get there." □

Rowing club wins some, loses some, in first regatta

by Alec MacLaren
Charlatan Staff

It was mixed results for the Raven men's and women's rowing crews in their first regatta of the season -- the Head of the Rideau -- held within grunting distance of Carleton on the Rideau Canal.

The novice men's eights took top honors in their race against the University of Ottawa Gee-Gee crew, while Carleton sculler Rob Bennett finished third among seven racers in the lightweight men's single scull.

"Sometimes we were just flying" said John Nisbet of the novice men's eight. They beat the Gee-Gee novices by 14 seconds after more than 23 minutes of racing. The win was a huge victory for the crew, as it had only been set four days earlier.

The highlight on the women's side was the thrilling third-place finish by the varsity women's coxed four, ahead of their "downwater" rival Ottawa Gee-Gees.

Rowing Raven Trevor MacKay pulled a 23:12 time against the clock in his varsity men's single scull race, winning by default when no other sculler entered.

While some Carleton rowers were able to show their metal right off the bat, others talked in terms of perspective.

Brian Jules, of the varsity men's coxed four which finished second of two, said "we have a lot of potential . . . we just need to get in better condition."

Jules described the disappointing last-place finish of the varsity men's eights, in which the varsity women's four and a lightweight four raced together for the first time as "a bit of a science project."

John Ossonski, the Ravens' women's rowing coach, was pleased with the capabilities of his rowers.

"I see a lot of potential here, a lot of good rowers."

Ossonski said he was not concerned with the women's mixed results because they had only been together for two weeks.

Among other finishes, the women's varsity double finished second of three boats and the varsity men's double placed third among four.

The Ravens' next challenge is the Trent Regatta in Peterborough on Oct. 2. □

Breakfast with Mr. Poopyhead

by Andrea Smith
Charlatan Staff

Tom Stewart is soooo cuuuuuute.

At eight o'clock in the morning, over a non-healthy yet inexpensive breakfast, the bassist/singer for Furnaceface discussed the band's new CD single, "Nobody To Vote For."

eral lack of outrage over the poor choice of candidates in the impending federal election.

"Usually I can bear it, but this time, ooooh man, it's soooo bad," says Stewart. "I can't vote for any of those people, and everybody I talk to says 'Yeah, you're right.'"

He dips his toast in his egg yolks.

He says he doesn't know of any other bands doing anything like "Nobody To Vote For."

"Maybe people are just ground down and worn out enough that they feel they can't make a difference," says Stewart. "Maybe you can't make a difference, but you can make a statement. That's what this song is, I guess—or maybe it's just entertainment."

Apparently, you can get pretty far with entertainment.

The news media, in a shocking breach of protocol, have frenzied around this single act of critical thought.

"There's so much hype about it," says Stewart. "Maclean's phoned me this morning. And we're going to be on the Ralph Benmurgi show."

Much Music, "Canada's music station," was so inspired by "Nobody To Vote For" that the station offered to shoot a video for free.

According to Stewart, all the electoral candidates received press releases regarding the single, but he has had no reactions from any of them.

The Charlatan tried to reach all the major parties for a reaction to Furnaceface's manifesto, but only the Reform party called back.

Betty MacDonald is in charge of public relations for the Reform party in Ottawa.

"Oh for heaven's sake, isn't that an awful cynical attitude," she said after hearing the title of the CD.

But when read the lyric "Why is it all we ever get are short-sighted, power-hungry jerks?" MacDonald perked up.

"I think they're absolutely right," she says. "They're looking out for the future generation."

MacDonald then launched into a speech on how politicians of the past 20 years have mortgaged our future.

"That's why I joined the Reform party," she said.

Regardless, Stewart won't be encouraging anybody to vote for the Reform party.

"I think I'm going to spoil my ballot and encourage other people to do the same," he says.

"All I'm saying is give me some options. I mean, I'm not saying I have solutions, or that I know somebody better. I'm just saying that right now the people who are being offered don't cut it."

At that point Stewart had to leave the restaurant to go help the rest of the band load equipment. They were leaving that morning to play London and Hamilton, and to shoot the Much Music video in Toronto over the weekend.

The Charlatan was invited to continue the interview with the rest of the band at the Sound Of One Hand studio, with a ride on the new Furnaceface bus as a bonus.

Stewart knows how to handle a bus.

He parked it illegally in front of Sound of One Hand, with the left-rear tire wedged up on the edge of the curb.

He was greeted by the band's patchy-blue-haired guitarist/singer Pat Bannister.

Inside the studio's posh surroundings, Bannister echoed Stewart's sentiment behind the single.

"We had this song, we kind of wrote it awhile ago, and we couldn't get the record done before the election, so we decided to release it as a single," says Bannister. "There doesn't seem to be anyone else saying anything good or bad about what's going on."

He says his dissatisfaction with the electoral candidates stems from their lack of honesty.

"If I could just believe that everyone was saying what they meant," he says, "instead of saying what they think they should be saying."

And what of Friday Night with Ralph Benmurgi?

"I don't know, I don't know," says Bannister of what he intends to do on the show. "I think we're just going to play the song—thank God. I don't know. It's live, anything can happen."

Jones is the owner of Sound Of One Hand, as well as Furnaceface's keyboardist/guitarist. He didn't seem interested in answering questions. He spent a lot of time joking around with the other band members. I asked him one question, and he just joked around some more.

At one point he did a Tom Waits-like thing on the piano, and afterward busied himself getting things ready to be loaded, singing something like, "the Captain was a one-eyed dwarf."

"The Captain was a one-eyed dwarf."

"I think some people will take it a lot more seriously than maybe we take it," says drummer Dave Dudley of the new single.

But as Stewart pointed out during the course of the conversation, it would be easier for Dudley to take the single less seriously, because he can't actually vote. The drummer has had landed immigrant status for the past 25 years.

"I'm from England. I've lived here all my life, I just haven't become a citizen," he says. "But I certainly agree with the sentiment that there's a serious problem with how people you elect get to the positions they do, and how little choice we actually have in that decision-making process."

As a whole, the band claims they're not actually suggesting anybody do anything, they're just making their point.

In one brief burst of speech, Jones summarized their position nicely.

"We wouldn't ever want to suggest that the Canadian public do anything. We wouldn't want to throw a complete spanner into the works," he says. "We don't suggest that people actually get off their asses and do anything." □

Tom Stewart: he's sooo cuuuute!

While he spoke, he tried to keep a piece of fried egg from sliding off his toast as he lifted it to his mouth.

Stewart says musically the band has come a long way since the last album Just Buy It.

"We've played a lot more so we're a better band. We sing a little bit better," says the blue-eyed rock god, who at 30, seems remarkably spry.

"Marty (keyboards/guitar) plays guitar on a lot of the songs in the new record. It tends to be kinda heavier, more black. And there's no songs like 'My Girlfriend Thinks She's Fat.'"

The single's official launch happened in simulcast on CKCU and CHUO Sept. 27.

"Nobody To Vote For," which has a limited release of 1,000 copies, features two tracks from Furnaceface's album set for release in January: the title track as well as "Beg The Question."

Stewart says Furnaceface decided to release the single not just as a promo for the new album, but because of the gen-

Playing music in the big city

by Stephanie Garrison
Charlatan Staff

As you'd probably expect, Luscious Jackson, a groovily slack new band from New York, picked up its name from a sports trivia book that had misspelt basketball player Lucious Jackson's name.

The band is currently one of Manhattan's big underground draws. Jill, Gabby and Kate played their first show together just over a year ago, and keyboardist Vivian was a May addition.

Right now, they're at that point in their career where the stage is small, the buzz is big, and financial backing is almost non-existent. None of the band members hold day jobs any more, and they've released their first EP, In Search Of Manny.

Rumors that In Search Of Manny was named after a guy who used to own a record store in Soho before disappearing are unfounded. The Manny of this record was a 17-year-old boyfriend Gabby's then 35-year-old mother used to date in the seventies.

This seven-song album is the second release put out by Grand Royal, the Beastie Boys-created label that also produced the Beasties' Check Your Head. Kate is old pals with the band, and was drummer on the Beasties' first two EPs, Pollywog Stew and Cookie Puss.

Drawing on their love for disco, punk and hip hop music, Luscious Jackson's EP is a seventies-heavy stew heated by the band's lazily sexual stage persona. Their sexuality is not always a key issue to the music, but it's impossible not to notice just how sassy this band sounds.

They're even more potent live, and never fail to compel the audience to dance. In New York City, this is a feat in itself.

The members, all in their late-20s, aren't bothered by the "all-girl" tag that inevitably follows the band around.

"It's obvious that someone's going to mention it because it's still a novelty," Jill, the lead singer, notes. "We're not at taking back the pit," Jill says. "We're a bit more mellow."

Kate says although their music and lyrics have a feminine point of view "because that's (our) experience," they are not a pushy, in-your-face band loudly proclaiming that, "we're women, we can rock!"

"Luckily, we grew up with enough

"It was all about fashion and the art world, cocaine," Jill sighs.

"The art scene didn't engage us," Kate deadpans.

The women reacted to the cultural changes surrounding them. They rejected the Wham dance, avoided clubs and started doing well in art school. Gabby escaped to Paris during one year of college just to be somewhere else.

"We just bummed out," Gabby laughs.

"I was so depressed in '84, oh my God." Kate recalls a long, discouraging stretch of time looking in the Village Voice for live music clubs. But indie rock and the slow resurgence of live guitar music helped the band members gravitate back to music.

According to Kate, the scene has improved considerably since then, and clubs are more willing to book bands that aren't in a particular genre.

"It seems like the whole world is much hipper now for some reason, or more open-minded. I don't know why," says Jill.

"People in their 20s are kind of running shit now," Kate says. "That might be it. They have a lot of the same influences and went through the same phases we did."

Luscious Jackson has no master plan to forcibly take the industry by the balls in the near future.

"I think we're kind of over the goal thing because it's really depressing," Jill says. "People promise you things and they let you down."

She's all too aware of the danger of naiveté in the music business. Although their focus is a little more long-term than mere daily aspirations, any projections more than a few months ahead are described in tentative language.

"We're not in that position yet where we can say which tour we want to go on; now we're just fishing for who wants us to go on tour," Jill says. "Who knows? That (uncertainty) is part of being a New Yorker."

"A little jaded," Kate says. "Not really," Jill concludes, "just more realistic." □ that point where it's considered commonplace, so you have to expect it."

Luscious Jackson is more concerned with making a record that sounds "cool and original," than with infusing their music with loads of meaning.

"A lot of bands have female aggression as an angle, you know, Riot Grrrls people to encourage us that it was not unusual to be playing music," Jill says. "All our favorite bands, the first bands we saw, had women in them." Bands like Talking Heads and Blondie.

At an early age, they were exposed to the cultural going-ons of their native city via parental influence.

It's probably no coincidence that Jill told Mean Street Magazine that the EP is about "searching for our childhood in the seventies in New York City... all the stuff we felt and the music we listened to and the freedom we had running around the city."

Around the mid-eighties, the various band members began to get very depressed. The club scene got stale. It was no longer geared towards live music, but drinking, drugs, and trends.

Toure de force

by Alex Bustos

Ali Farka Toure (See and Hear the World '93)
Sept. 24
Museum of Civilization Theatre

Last Friday, I spent an evening with a musical storyteller.

Ali Farka Toure, a blues guitarist from Mali, spun his notes around 400 people Sept. 24 at the Museum of Civilization.

Backed by only two drummers, Toure treated the audience to an eclectic musical delight, blending blues with West African rhythms. At times it was like listening to John Lee Hooker with an African beat.

At another point in his performance, he layered his music with a combination of a tropical beat and echoes of psychedelia and "space rock" (à la Steve Vai) riffs, singing in various African dialects. Even later, echoes of Caribbean music and memories of Venezuelan tunes came to mind.

This made the end result surprising. Instead of his performance being a mix of clashing styles, his collage of sound came together into a constant, funky groove. Like Paco de Lucia (one of the most famous flamenco guitarists in the world), Toure can blend various riffs, melodies and beats into a homogenous sound unlike anything you've ever heard.

It was a sound the audience ate up. The couple in front of me were swinging and swaying in their seats. When the crowd was instructed to clap their hands, they obeyed, keeping up the beat for the entire five-minute song. When the next tune started, they picked up where they had left off and kept the beat. Then, when the show ended, they clapped for an encore.

For those who have never attended a concert at the Museum of Civilization, engendering the reaction Toure did is no small feat.

Picture this: an audience composed of mainly ex-hippies who look like they work for the CBC and a sprinkling of university students. They are civil -- but "cool" -- and are always very proper. Now picture this group, yelling and screaming for an encore.

Trust me, you have to be a great musician to do this.

And Toure is a great musician. At one point in his performance he commented in French, "The guitar has accepted us," a great metaphor for how the audience felt about him. □

Grandmother shakes the Hog Rock

by Christopher Nuttal-Smith
Charlatan Staff

Maria Hawkins
Thursday nights
Hog Rock Cafe

It didn't seem like the greatest place to listen to Maria Hawkins sing the blues.

I wasn't expecting a lot as I walked into the Hog Rock Cafe last Thursday. Judging from the chipped paint and grimy mirrors, the place is pretty old. Prehistoric liquor bottles and neon beer signs provide the only decor and the near-empty bar reeks of stale smoke and fresh beer.

But after talking with Hawkins, I warmed up to the place a little. A 36-year-old mother of three and a grandmother, Hawkins is a relative newcomer to the Ottawa bar scene, having performed for only two years. She's the only woman — not to mention the only grandmother — in Ottawa with a weekly gig.

Her unique status has provided her with some obstacles to overcome. "It's rough being a singer when you're also a mother and grandmother . . . even more 'cause I'm not part of the clique, I'm not established," she says.

But that doesn't keep her from putting on a good show. Hawkins fronts a progressive, down-and-dirty, thigh-slapping gig that leaves her audience feeling good and pleading for more.

Her band leapt into action at 9:30 p.m. with "Bonehead Blues," a down and dirty, hard-driving tune led by the inspired hands of guitarist John Yemensky. As the players wiped away the kind of sweat that can only be earned through a phenomenal jam, Hawkins sauntered on stage and took over a warming crowd.

Hawkins — part diva, part blues-evangelist — delivered a perpetual surge of music that explored every crevice of the blues, from KoKo Taylor to Janis Joplin.

Her stage performance, equal parts banter and song, hinted at how she hitched up with the blues. "One day I went out to a blues jam and the music started to come," she says from the stage. "I need to make a livin' and this here's the best thing I can do."

And she did it well. Hawkins' euphoric, growling high notes could be heard half a block away from the bar. As the gig progressed, on-lookers entered, often at her behest. Business and professional types trickled in, mixing with the Hog Rock's working-class crowd. And they were all thrilled by the music.

As the band played on, the Hog Rock started to look a lot better. I realized that it's the paradigm of a blues bar: no glitz, no strobe lights, no shit, with cheap beer and plastic glasses.

Hawkins poured so much effort and emotion into her music it's obvious that she's lived with the pain that her music satirizes. "The Fishing Song" is about a lying, cheating boyfriend who goes on a fishing trip in a new suit and shoes. When he returns five months later, his girlfriend asks, "And just what did you catch on this fishing trip?"

As she introduced the tune, some of the audience giggled and a few regulars clapped in anticipation. Hawkins said, "It's a sad story of my life . . . I don't know how you (guys) can get so much enjoyment (out of it)!"

Obviously, much of her inspiration comes from life experience. A single mother at 16, Hawkins quickly learned she "couldn't run home between classes to feed (her) babies."

While most teenagers were at school or experiencing the world, she was working dead-end jobs trying to support her family. Hawkins quips, "I've even got my own collection of hairnets and name tags."

Her brand of blues is hardly the sad, twangy blues of the 1930s, though. She may have experienced the tougher side of life, but she doesn't show it. She is a storyteller who sings about love and sex and divorce. She's an evangelist who preaches the power of self.

Now that she's got a regular gig, Hawkins is already joking about renovating the bar to expand the stage. "I want a recording contract, I want my own TV show . . ."

I couldn't tell if she was joking. □

Actors kidnap hostile theatre critic!

by Prema Oza

Critical Acclaim
Great Canadian Theatre
Company's Night Howl Series
Oct. 1 and Oct. 2 at 11 p.m.

My companion and I were completely psyched to see this play.

The novel premise of a play reviewer doomed by his own pen lured us into the GCTC this late Friday night.

It managed to overcome a slow beginning and in the end was almost gripping. (Whew! I hope this will detract reality from mimicking the play's plot . . .)

This piece of theatre is actually a play within a play. When a theatre critic named Mike Loomis gives a "hurtful" review of a play staged by a small theatre company, it results in the play's cancellation and the destruction of the lives of people involved.

To exact revenge, three members of the company — the playwright Johnny and two of his actors, Rita and Andy — kidnap the reviewer intending to kill him, but not until they make him understand the play and its message. "You're going to understand this even if it kills you," says Johnny.

That said, the beginning almost killed me. Loomis describes how Johnny's players are "more interested in entertaining themselves than anyone else." At the risk of bodily harm, this seems to hold true for the actual production.

The play takes off rather slowly. Interestingly enough, Loomis says the same thing about Johnny's play. However, the plot quickly gains momentum as the kidnappers become more violent and the reviewer gets more indignant and unyielding in the face of their attempts to sway him.

In addition to this, the reviewer and the actual audience are repeatedly subjected to tortuous scenes of Johnny's play enacted in front of Loomis, who is bound to a chair.

The script is, however, boundless. Writer GATD Caplan (who also directed the play) comes up with some great lines.

After Johnny goes on a rant in defense of one of his character's lines, Loomis exclaims, "Oh my God!!! You really talk like this, don't you!!!"

Another such line in the play Loomis reviews makes a reference to a character's relation to nature being like Robert Bateman's to roadkill.

At one point, when the kidnappers hesitate to take the reviewer to the bathroom, he says if they don't comply he will shit right there. Andy, the most tortured of the kidnappers, says rather glibly, "you've shit on us before."

The set design was cheap. It had to be. We're talking about a bunch of struggling actors after all. Talk appeared to be cheap as well. The dialogue was stiff and rehearsed, staged even. Perhaps this was part of the postmodern connotation of the play within a play premise. I dunno . . .

On a more serious level, this play takes a very personal look at the lives of each character as they regale each other on how they ended up being actors, playwrights and reviewers. For instance, Loomis admits that he could never act or put on a play.

Also, upon hearing that one of the actors committed suicide, Loomis asks quietly if it was his review that did it. "No," says Andy, "she was a heroin addict."

The conclusion is also quite unconventional in that the ending has an intriguing twist. All in all, it was a good effort, but I wouldn't contort myself all out of shape to see this play. □

Hey Kids!

What's with you people?

Maybe the question was too hard, but nobody won the fabulous prize offered in this space last week. So, we'll give you one more chance to pick up the award-winning novel. . .

The English Patient by Michael Ondaatje!

All you have to do to acquire this fine piece of Canadian literature is correctly answer this slightly easier skill-testing question:

What's your favourite color?

That's it. Drop your answer off along with your name and phone number in the Special Prize Box at the Charlatan's office (Room 531 Unicentre) by 3 p.m. Monday, September 20. The winner will be selected in a random draw. Charlatan staff aren't eligible for this wonderful contest.

Heaven Dog — opening for Doughboys and Redd Kross
Oct. 1
Porter Hall

Insert tape. Press PLAY. The Ned's Atomic Dustbin-inspired bass line enters, followed by a crackling sampled voice complaining "Doc, I keep seeing this girl wherever I go — and I hear her voice too." The guitar and drums crash down, soon joined by a high-strung voice singing "You just make me think I'm the greatest/If you knew me or my life you'd say I'm a loser . . ."

That, the first 32 seconds of Heaven Dog's Holy Cow cassette, is like the Coles Notes on Heaven Dog itself.

Those first 32 seconds display power-pop finesse, suburbia-bred angst, teenage self-deprecation and raging hormones; that, folks, is Heaven Dog.

This local suburban foursome of Damian Brody (bass), Chris Crabtree (voice), Oliver Marsh (guitar), and Ted Wilson (drums), has existed for only a year. In that year though, they have shared the stage with Ottawa biggies such as The Skatterbrains, Mystic Zealots, Fishtales, and Furnaceface, as well as out-of-towners like Bliss, Screaming Weasel, and Bad Brains.

Holy Cow, their debut cassette, was quickly picked up by local label One Handed Records, has sold around 500 copies (150 within a week of its release this spring) and has gotten considerable local campus radio airplay.

What is the secret to their success? "Being young probably helps," says Bromby, who, at 20, is the eldest member of the band. "Everyone likes seeing someone as young as them up on stage."

Heaven Dog, sealed for freshness.

Their youth is undeniably a factor in their popularity. Heaven Dog shows seem to double as conventions for 14- to 18-year-olds with a penchant for plaid and baggy trousers. Fresh-faced fans, male and female, cram the front of the stage, dancing, thrashing, and singing along. It's like a high-school dance, only with cool music and without the weenies.

"Part of the reason why we're so popular with the high-school audience," says Wilson, "is — well, speaking from a high-school kid's point of view, high-school kids don't want to hear about political problems. They want to hear about stuff that deals with them."

"We don't write about logging problems in Victoria," he adds, "because we can't relate to that. The only things on our minds are school and girls."

Makes you think high school isn't that bad. □

10 fun Heaven Dog Facts

10) Guitarist Oliver Marsh is the mastermind behind local indie label Wet Records. He has done engineering and production work for local young bucks like Lemon Weapons, Mushroom Explosion, Poopookakandthebumbums, Cowpint and Trip Hammer.

9) Bandmates claim Marsh's body is incapable of producing adrenaline, thus explaining his often sedate stage behavior.

8) Bassist Damian Bromby admits to "honking" (i.e. throwing up, for those of us who don't live in Kanata) prior to going onstage at Furnacefest, last month's orgy of indie music at Lansdowne Park.

"It was partially because I was hungover," says Bromby, "but mainly because I was nervous."

7) Vocalist Chris Crabtree was kicked out of Circle Square Ranch, a Christian summer camp, for "pooning" (i.e. fucking, for those of us who don't live in Kanata) a fellow camper.

6) Crabtree was also kicked out of Beaver Scouts — hopefully not for the same reasons as the Circle Square Ranch incident.

5) Drummer Ted Wilson, on the other hand, was a model Cub Scout and earned all his merit badges.

"I didn't go on to Scouts though," says Wilson. "I was scared of those winter camping trips."

4) Bromby didn't participate in Beaver Scouts, Cub Scouts, or Circle Square Ranch.

"Damian's childhood was a blur of rock 'n' roll and BMX-ing," says Wilson.

3) Heaven Dog enjoyed their 15 minutes of fame at the aforementioned Furnacefest. They were asked to sign a female fan's cast, and Crabtree was given a "wonky thing" (i.e. a cylindrical noise-making toy, for those of us who don't live in . . . actually, for anybody other than from Crabtree) with "I Love You Chris" written on it.

2) Wilson financed the Holy Cow cassette with money he made from having green slime poured onto his head.

In the mid-to-late eighties he was an actor on the television series You Can't Do That On Television, a kid-comedy in which characters were drenched with a mysterious goo upon mention of a secret word.

"I made lots of money off that because it was a big show," says Wilson. "I got really lucky when I was young so now I don't have to work through my teenage years."

Incidentally, the show received many complaints from parents due to scenes involving young boys stripping down to their underwear and being shackled to a prison wall.

1) They'll be opening for Montreal's Doughboys on Oct. 1 at Carleton's Porter Hall. All Heaven Dog members are Doughboys disciples and are thrilled to share the stage with Canada's candycore gurus. Crabtree jokingly says he hopes to take advantage of the huge show's "fringe benefits."

"I'm hoping I can get lots of chicks' phone numbers after," says Crabtree.

"Yeah," says Bromby. "Ones he doesn't have to pay for by the minute." □

LONG DAY IN THE UNIVERSE

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 30 TO THURSDAY, OCTOBER 7

Thursday, September 30

Cinémathèque Canada in the Museum of Civilization presents Blackmail, Alfred Hitchcock's first ever film with sound. Show starts at 7 p.m.

Friday, October 1

Today's free noontime concert (12:30 p.m., Alumni Theatre) features David Irving of jazz piano fame. International Socialists: don't picket this event! It's not that David Irving.

It's the show of the month! Doughboys! Redd Kross! Heaven Dog! At Porter Hall! Tickets are $10 in advance, $12 at the door. They're available at the usual independent outlets and the Unicentre Store.

At Zaphod's, it's a Youth Challenge International Benefit with Ottawa's Stone Soul Picnic and Atomic Orange. Five dollars will get you in to this worthy cause.

Far From Vietnam, "one of the most important films of the sixties," is described by the Cinémathèque Canada guide as a "collage/fresco by seven French directors on the subject of the Vietnam war." Sounds good. It's at the Museum of Civilization, at 9 p.m.

Running today through next Thursday it's the Best of the Bytowne series, featuring the best movies from the cinema's five years of existence. The celebration starts off tonight at 7 p.m. with a party for Bytowne members, including contests, movie previews, free popcorn and a screening of the definitive androgyny epic The Crying Game. It's free for members.

It's the "hottest blend of dancehall, soca and reggae straight from Barbados!" Or so raves Spice and Co.'s press release. They're playing tonight at Creeque Alley.

Saturday, October 2

The late show at the Mayfair tonight is the always entertaining Eraserhead, David Lynch's first film. It starts at 11 p.m. and tickets are a very reasonable $5.

It's the infamous traditional sounds of Killiecrankie at the Glebe Community Centre at 8:30 p.m. It's put on by the Old Sod Folk Music Society, so you know what to expect. As always, tickets are $10 for members and $12 for everyone else, available at the Ottawa Folklore Centre and at the door.

The annual Take Back the Night rally takes place tonight at 7:30 p.m. at the National Gallery of Canada, with a march to follow.

Sunday, October 3

The Irish Rovers play tonight at the Centrepointe Theatre ($22.50 for tickets). Twenty-somethings' eyes well up with tears as memories of that unicorn song conjure up images of a time when things were simpler and they didn't have to pay rent.

Monday, October 4

For all you cool types out there, the Mayfair's showing a double bill: Sid and Nancy, a homage to a drug-addicted, talented media creation. At 9:15 p.m., Rude Boy is a movie featuring concert footage of The Clash. Hooray.

As part of its Quinzaine Acadienne, which runs until the 17th, the National Arts Centre presents singer Edith Butler through Oct. 9. It's in support of the Congrès Mondial Acadien that'll be happening in New Brunswick next summer. It's at the NAC Studio and tickets are $20 though the NAC Box Office or Ticketmaster.

Ali Farka Toure: the man himself.

Tuesday, October 5

Today's reading tip, courtesy of Charlton production manager Kevin McKay, is W.P. Kinsella's baseball classic Shoeless Joe. Says Kevin: "It's the best book about the American pastime ever written — and it's written by a Canadian!"

It's a BBQ! Go to the fountain in front of the admin building between noon and 1 p.m. Bring $5. It won't get you much — just a burger or a hot dog, chips and a drink, but there'll be entertainment and door prizes (where are they going to put the door?). It's all to kick off Carleton's United Way thing.

Wednesday, October 6

Big band around Toronto, Lowest of the Low graces the Zaphod's stage this early evening. Opening the show is Winnipeg's Acoustically Inclined. Tickets are eight bucks at the door.

(Is it just me, or are Zaphod's cover charges going up? It used to be that every show except perhaps a big-name American act was five dollars. This month, out of 13 bands, only six cost five dollars. Just asking. — ed.)

TIM O'CONNOR

Spend time with your radio. This week, In A Mellow Tone (CKCU 93.1 FM, 9 p.m. — 11 p.m.) features music from Memphis.

Thursday, October 7

Here's another chance to relive the seventies. It's Disco Thursday with the Hammer Heads, at The Pit, below On Tap.

If you've got a listing you want to appear in this handy calendar, drop us a line at Room 531 Unicentre during regular office hours or fax us at 788-4051. Listings must be in by the Friday before publication.

Security officers get special status

by Brandie Weikle
Charlatan Staff

Four of Carleton's security officers received special constable status on Oct. 4. "They will have the power to make arrests, to detain people, and to lay charges," says Mark Tinlin, director of the department of university safety.

The special constables will not carry guns or billy clubs.

People detained by the constables will be held at the patrol office, says Len Boudreault, assistant director of the department of university safety.

Security officers who do not have this status can't lay charges and are only able to make citizen arrests, says Tinlin.

Larry Sampson, Alan Parker, Mike Warner, and Rick Percival spent three months training to be special constables at Ontario Police College, in Aylmer, Ont., near London.

Parker says the new special constables will help make things go a lot smoother.

"It's going to be a lot better for our staff," says Parker.

"We can deal with the small problems on sight, instead of having to wait for the Ottawa Police to arrive.

We can deal with the trespassers and disturbances ourselves. We will still be having the police in for more serious incidents."

Tuition for the course cost the department $4,000 per officer, says Tinlin. The officers were paid their usual salaries while they were trained.

Because the new special constables will now fall under a new employment

Two of Carleton's new special constables.

(officers.)"

Carleton President Robin Farquhar says the constables learned about matters relating to culture, multiculturalism and sensitivity at the police college, as well as a community approach to policing.

"I should think that not only are they going to be more sensitive and knowledgeable, but also more authoritative. As a result, I think they'll quickly earn the respect of people on campus," Farquhar says.

Lucy Watson, president of the Carleton University Students' Association, is not convinced this will solve the problem of campus safety.

"I think there are a lot of improvements that need to be made throughout the entire university structure," says Watson. "We need more lighting and we need more security phones. We need to look at the parking garage.

"I think we need to hire more women in the department of university safety, more people of color and people with disabilities."

Watson says the greater efficiency that security officers can now have as special constables will be a benefit to everyone, but says it still doesn't stop incidents from happening on campus.

Foot Patrol co-ordinator Brenda Kennedy says she thinks the new constables will be helpful. "What I'm concerned about is flashers and sexual assaults which can now be arrested immediately."

Now, nine of Ontario's 16 universities have security staff with special constables. As well as Carleton, these universities include Windsor, Western, Guelph, McMaster, Brock, Toronto, Trent and Laurentian.

Carleton has 20 security staff. Four of them are trained as dispatchers, and 16 are security officers. Four of these officers are now special constables.

Two are in training, and another two have been chosen to go to police college in January.

None of the new special constables are women or people of color, says Tinlin. The department's agreement with the union stipulates that special constables must be chosen by seniority, he says.

"Unfortunately, a long time ago, when most of the people were hired, they were all men," says Tinlin.

He says a woman will train in the upcoming course. No people of color are represented yet, he says.

"I hope that all my patrol staff will eventually take the training and receive the status," Tinlin says. □

TA union member calls for equity

by Matt Skinner
Charlatan Staff

A motion intended to ensure that people of color would be represented at an upcoming national convention of the Canadian Union of Public Employees received only one vote at Local 2323's general membership meeting.

The local's membership includes teaching assistants, research assistants, student computer consultants and student sessional lecturers at Carleton.

Robin Browne, a teaching assistant for the school of journalism who made the motion, says the Sept. 14 meeting was the first meeting he had attended.

At the meeting, local members were preparing to choose two members to send to a national CUPE convention in Vancouver from Nov. 14-19.

"I put up my hand and I said 'I see that I'm the only brown person in the room. I assume there are more brown TAs, and if there are they should be represented also. So I'd like to make a motion that one of these two people has to be a person of color,'" Browne says.

"There are concerns that (people of color) have that really only we would know how to push at a meeting."

Browne says he was the only person who voted for the motion. About 30 people attended the meeting.

Initially a lot of people spoke in favor of the motion, says local president Michel Roy.

"As a result of the debate that went on, I guess they changed their minds."

Paul Whiteley, the local's vice-president internal, says he thinks some members felt there were only two positions available and the only issue the motion dealt with was that of skin color.

An amendment to Browne's motion, as found in the minutes of the meeting, says that at least one representative of a minority or oppressed group be nominated for each of the positions. The amended motion was carried.

An oppressed group includes anyone who "does not occupy a traditional position of privilege or authority," says Roy.

This includes women, gays, lesbians and bisexuals, people of color and people with disabilities, he says.

Browne says he feels that the union needs some sort of affirmative action program to go out and meet TAs who are people of color, because they feel alienated.

He says this could be something as simple as members of the executive going and talking to members who are people of color.

Whiteley says Browne's proposal is a good idea and something the local has to work at.

"It seems to me that we, as a union, do have a problem in making our meetings accessible and seem relevant to people from minority communities. I think that is a problem."

Roy says there are about 1,200 members in the local but does not know how many of them are people of color. He says there were more people than usual at the meeting.

Whiteley says due to the September meeting, the local's human rights advisory committee will "recommend constitutional changes for the local, in order to better accommodate the empowerment of various oppressed groups both within the local and in our representations to the university and elsewhere."

After Browne's motion was defeated and the amending motion carried, both Whiteley and Browne were nominated to attend the convention, but both declined.

Browne says he wanted to make it known that he was angry when the motion was defeated and he didn't want it to seem like his motive for the motion was to get nominated for the trip.

"To me it felt very much like taking the crumbs instead of the cookie," says Browne.

Whiteley says he declined for a number of reasons.

"I didn't think that I would be the most effective person to carry these battles forth within CUPE's structures," Whiteley says. "I felt that in this case it

Student says CUSA hiring practices unfair

by Andrea Wiebe

A student who was turned down for a job with the Carleton University Students' Association claims he was discriminated against because he is disabled.

Kevin Kinsella, a mature student who uses a wheelchair, has complained to CUSA President Lucy Watson that CUSA discriminated against him on the basis of his disability because he was not hired as CUSA's deputy chief electoral officer.

Kinsella says he plans to take the issue to the Ontario Human Rights Commission. He says he has contacted a human rights officer about the situation, and will file a complaint next week.

Watson says Kinsella's accusation is unfounded. "I will state, for the record, that the students' association, particularly the executive, has been striving this year towards ensuring that people of color, women, and people with disabilities are given an opportunity over and above (others)."

Kinsella says he applied for the position on Sept. 20 and was interviewed on Sept. 23. He was notified on the same afternoon that he didn't get the job.

was probably more effective to send people who could do the necessary shit disturbing at the level of the national union."

The only two delegates to accept their nominations were Roy and another member, Pam Scholey, says Whiteley. They will represent CUPE Local 2323 at the national convention in November. □

Colleen Felstead was hired for the position.

The deputy chief electoral officer hires the poll clerks and deputy returning officers, and is responsible to the chief electoral officer. The position lasts from the byelection in November until the end of CUSA elections in February.

Watson says she sees no discrimination within the hiring board.

"I have been assured, and I am quite certain, that the person with the best qualifications was hired for this position. However, I am not at liberty to disclose any of the information that was discussed during hiring boards, or résumés. They're all confidential," says Watson.

Kinsella says he has been involved in politics and in the electoral process since he was very young. "I've been around politics since I was a little kid," Kinsella says.

At the age of 13, Kinsella was the first chair of the children and youth advisory committee for the City of Ottawa. He has assisted in municipal election campaigns and has served on committees such as Ottawa's disabled citizen's advisory committee and CUSA's committee on the First-year students stuck on theatre floor

by Naomi Bock
Charlatan Staff

First-year engineering students sitting on the floor of their class in Bell Theatre aren't getting a quality education, says their professor Peter Frise.

The dean of engineering's office reports 433 students enrolled in first-year engineering, 72 more than last year. Bell Theatre only holds 400 students.

"Every single seat is full, and there are people sitting in the flippin' aisles. It's just not right," Frise says. "A whole bunch of people showed up at the end of the summer that we didn't expect. The infrastructure of our program isn't able to cope with that."

Frise says he wasn't told about the new admissions, and wasn't able to prepare for them with teaching staff or materials.

"I don't have any more TAs for this and I have 50 more people than I figured I'd have. So the TAs I have are working pretty darn hard."

Frise says the bookstore wasn't informed of the increase either, and didn't have enough books until the fourth week of classes.

"We were photocopying workbook sheets and that's breaking the copyright law," says Frise.

Vic Chapman, Carleton's director of admissions, says the vice-president academic and the dean of engineering targeted an enrolment of 450 students for this year.

Tom Wilkinson, the university's assistant vice-president academic, says the problem is the unpredictable number of responses to offers of admission.

"Last year we undertargeted, this year we overtargeted. We don't know what the response will be from year to year."

Chapman told The Charlatan, through his assistant Barbara Brady, that it would take "too much time to calculate" how many offers of admission were sent out this year, or how many were accepted.

Wilkinson says more students means more money for the university. But he says while this year's target rate was "revenue-related," it also matched the faculty's capacity.

Chong Chan, the associate dean of engineering, says "once offers of admission are accepted, we have to honor that."

He says this year's sharp increase was due to a "last-minute rush that no one can explain."

Booking lecture halls must be done months in advance, says Chan. "But there needs to be a reminder of the numbers (of students)."

Chan says his office has few alternatives at this point.

"We are addressing the problem, however poorly equipped we are."

Frise says he doesn't object to an increase in numbers, but to the fact he wasn't warned and the university wasn't organized for the increase. "There is a pretty serious lack of communication," he says.

"They didn't tell me, they didn't tell the dean, they didn't tell the bookstore. I just don't understand it."

Frise says there is also a safety issue with overcrowding. "If there was a fire and somebody tripped because there was a knapsack in the aisle, I'd be responsible."

Why is the OC Transpo student bus pass only available to full-time students and not part-timers?

Well, the answer to this humdinger is basically in the numbers.

A student bus pass for one month costs $43.50.

If a part-time student travelled to the university four times in a week, a total of eight trips, it would cost $13 if four trips were during peak hours and four were off-peak.

Multiply that by four weeks and it is $52 a month. That is about $10 more than the bus pass, which hardly seems right, considering many part-timers are part-timers because they are stone broke and may need the bus for other things like making money to go to school.

But consider further. Most full-time students only purchase bus passes for September, October and November because December is exam time and doesn't justify the expense. Same applies in the winter semester.

So actually, bus passes are only worth it for six months of the year, seeing as they are not available during the summer (another scam, but that's another story). So really part-timers may pay only $60 more than full-time students for the entire year.

And if they do use the bus more than four times a week, then they can buy a regular bus pass for $53, which is the regular price. And they are still only hit for about $60 more than a full-time student would pay.

So are part-timers getting the shaft from OC Transpo? Yes, but only moderately. Says Al Crippen, co-ordinator for the Mature and Part-Time Students' Centre, "I haven't heard complaints from anyone that was strictly a part-time student."

And there are other concerns for all students concerning bus service. Says Jim Watson, city councillor and OC Transpo board member, "you can't have a hundred priorities, and you have to determine what is the most attainable and what is going to help the greatest number of people."

Those concerns include improving the frequency and number of buses so that people that don't live in the Glebe can get service too and so students aren't crammed into the buses like small, smelly fish.

Part-timers are treated like smelly fish too, ya know. □

Anybody know a good mechanic?

"CUSA council is like a Hyundai in a winter storm in Ottawa. It goes nowhere."

The author of this quotation? No, not Kim Campbell. A Charlatan staffer? Good guess, but wrong. Sparky? Strike three.

It was none other than CUSA's own magician of math, sultan of statistics, finance commissioner René Faucher, who let everyone around him know early in the meeting that he would rather be in a winter storm on Sparks Street than at the CUSA council meeting held in Baker Lounge on Sept. 30.

Surprisingly, some interesting things arose from the meeting. It just took a long time to get there.

Councillors spent 45 minutes debating the meeting's agenda, because some councillors wanted to move a motion up on the agenda to remove nine delinquent councillors who haven't shown up to meetings.

Arts rep Todd McAllister, who just happened to be on the list, argued for moving it up, saying that he wouldn't be able to do his job with the axe poised over his head. But that was defeated.

Councillors spent just as long arguing over when and how to drop the byelection writ, the procedural motion to hold November's CUSA byelection.

They were in a classic catch-22 situation. Because if council dropped the writ before getting to that nasty delinquent councillor item, they wouldn't know how many seats were vacant for the writ.

But if council got rid of the delinquent councillors first, then they would lose quorum and wouldn't be able to move the writ at all.

Faucher tried to jump-start the Hyundai by suggesting that council move the writ and fill in the number of seats later. Council compromised by agreeing to this.

During question period, arts councillor John Edwards, l'enfant terrible of CUSA council, grilled Faucher and President Lucy Watson over executive perks such as the $273 gold rings each executive member receives at the end of their term, and $80 refills for their day planners. "If someone asked me, how could I possibly justify these perks?" asked Edwards.

"Don't justify it. Tell them to come to me and I'll justify it," Faucher replied.

After two hours of this type of exchange, the fun started.

Councillors debated that nasty delinquent councillor motion moved by vice-president internal Rob Jamieson (councillors skipped over about 30 items in between, but most of them had been tabled at past meetings anyway).

The list started with nine naughty councillors, but since three had already resigned and the five who managed to make the meeting were forgiven, it quickly dwindled to one — arts rep Chris Rogers, who had not been seen at council for many months.

To impeach a councillor, council needs a majority vote of at least 18 members. There were only 18 councillors present.

Council first voted on whether to vote by secret ballot. That was defeated. Then they debated whether to vote in favor of vacating Rogers's seat, and judging by the course of debate, it looked as if Mr. Roger's neighborhood would be deserted.

Council chose to vote by roll call, so each councillor's vote would be recorded. Council voted 16-0 with 2 abstentions to impeach Rogers, but that wasn't enough to remove him.

The abstainers were architecture rep Sheldon Baker and arts rep Tom Golem.

What followed belongs in the procedural Hall of Fame. Councillors tried to reconsider the matter, but they couldn't because to do so someone who voted against the motion had to reconsider it, and no one had voted no.

So council threw out Robert's Rules of Order (which guide standard meeting procedure) so they could reconsider the Chris Rogers question. Councillors voted to conduct a secret ballot when they voted again.

After a second vote on Rogers's seat, by secret ballot, council voted 18-0 to declare the seat vacant. Golem said later he abstained on the first vote because it wasn't right to vote publicly on a matter such as a councillor's future.

But it still wasn't over yet. Some councillors and Anandasangaree, the proxy for Watson after she left the meeting, moved a motion to destroy the minutes of the roll call, arguing that the circumstances were different after the second vote than they were after the first vote, namely that the roll call exposed how councillors voted the first time. But that motion was defeated without a formal vote. This was probably a good thing since The Charlatan had been taking notes the whole time and destroying the minutes would look pretty silly.

Better rev up those Hyundais. The storm could get bad. □ status of students with disabilities.

Kinsella says he feels he had the experience needed for the job. "I've been working in more elections than these people have been voting in."

In a letter of complaint sent to Watson, Kinsella requested a copy of the winning candidate's résumé. "I don't think they wanted a disabled person on the job," he says.

According to Kinsella, he was given no explanation as to why he was not hired even though he requested an explanation on Sept. 27 in a letter.

"Their (CUSA's) hiring policies may not fit with their practice. All you have to do is look around and see how many white people are working for CUSA. They're all white; they're all able-bodied. Not that I believe in affirmative action, but when they're all that way, you sort of wonder."

Watson says she has responded to Kinsella's letter by defending the hiring board's decision.

Rob Jamieson, CUSA's vice-president internal, says there were three people on the hiring board for the position of deputy chief electoral officer — Jamieson, CUSA vice-president external Kristine Haselsteiner, and James Rilett, CUSA's chief electoral officer.

"It was not an official hiring board; it was more of an advisory board to the chief electoral officer," says Jamieson.

Watson confirms this, saying, "This is one of the only times that the CEO (chief electoral officer) has actually held hiring boards. In the past they have appointed the individual because, in our constitution, the CEO is given the power to appoint the DEO (deputy chief electoral officer).

"In our situation, we actually went through interviews and a formal hiring process to ensure that everything was above board," she says.

Watson says no one on the hiring committee feels they acted inappropriately.

"I think everybody was really surprised actually, when they found out about the complaint. However, Kevin has yet to take this on to formal complaint stage."

She says to formally complain with CUSA, Kinsella must write to the chair of council and lodge a complaint. □

CUSA legal bill for summer finally in

by Brent Dowdall
Charlatan Staff

The Carleton University Students' Association has spent over two-thirds of its legal budget with eight months left to go in the school year, says CUSA finance commissioner René Faucher.

Faucher says legal bills from May to August amounted to $21,144.13 and CUSA has budgeted $30,000 in legal fees for the year.

Most of that total, $17,793.81, was for bills CUSA incurred in the labor dispute with some of its service co-ordinators. But it does not include the costs of representing CUSA at the Ontario Labor Relations Board hearings, which were to determine if CUSA unjustly fired two co-ordinators for trying to organize a union.

Faucher says the bill includes legal fees for any staff-related matter and negotiation on any union-related matter before the hearings in late August.

CAMPUS BRIEFS

"The bill is higher than in the past because there has been more activity in those areas than usual," Faucher says.

He says there will be one more "sizeable" billing, which will include the legal fees for the hearing. The Canadian Union of Public Employees covered the service co-ordinators' legal fees.

He says CUSA's final legal bill should be under $40,000 for the year, "unless something else comes up. Knock on wood," he says.

But Faucher says the fees are not an irresponsible use of funds.

"If we didn't spend extra money for proper legal representation it would have cost more in the long run. This is the bare minimum we could spend." □

Byelection date set

The Carleton University Students' Association will hold byelections on Nov. 9 and 10 to fill vacancies on CUSA council and undergraduate student seats for the university's senate.

The positions available for representatives on CUSA council are: one computer science, three science, two engineering, one architecture, one arts, one industrial design, three special students and three commerce.

The positions available on the senate are: two social science, one architecture/industrial design and two science/computer science.

Nominations must be made between Oct. 19 and 27. Chief electoral officer James Rilett says he will hold a nomination information meeting on Oct. 19.

Referendum questions are due Oct. 19 so CUSA council can vote on them.

The campaign opens Nov. 2 and the results should be known on Nov. 11. □

Computer thief caught in Loeb building

by Charlatan Staff

A man was charged with theft on Oct. 4 after campus security responded to an alarm in "a restricted area" of the Loeb Building, says the assistant director of the department of university safety.

Len Boudreault says a Carleton student was apprehended at 9:30 p.m. by a campus security officer, who was assisted by another officer at the scene.

The man was caught with two computers, two desk monitors and two keyboards from a computer lab in the Loeb Building, says Boudreault.

The individual was held in the patrol office for 10 to 15 minutes until the Ottawa Police arrived, he says.

Boudreault says the matter is still under investigation and he doesn't think it is concluded yet. "The incident is normal for this time of year," says Boudreault.

Boudreault says he doesn't know how many cases of theft there have been this year. However, he says "thefts increase around the beginning of the year."

Boudreault also says other computer equipment has been stolen from buildings on campus this year. □

McKenna stumps for Harb at CU

by Stefanka Kirinchich and David Docking
Charlatan Staff

New Brunswick Premier Frank McKenna visited Carleton on Sept. 30 with Ottawa Centre incumbent candidate Mac Harb to promote the cause of the Liberal party in the federal election.

McKenna, touted by some as a future candidate for the leadership of the federal Liberals, gave a short, bilingual speech before about 50 people in Baker Lounge.

Though McKenna said the purpose of his talk was to "provide insight into what it's like to run a Liberal government and the kind of difference it can make," he concentrated mostly on why students should vote for the Liberals in the Oct. 25 federal election.

McKenna said Jean Chrétien is the only leader who has had experience in dealing with fiscal, constitutional, aboriginal and international issues.

"To deny him the chance to be prime minister of Canada because he is experienced would be like denying Paul Molitor the chance to play in the World Series because he is experienced and going into the Hall of Fame," said McKenna.

McKenna said he was pleased to support Harb, whom he described as an activist.

"I like the fact that he is on the side of education issues... because I believe that if Canada is really going to meet the challenge of the 20th century, then education is going to be far and away our most important investment," said McKenna.

During a question and answer period, Harb said his party would be in favor of removing the seven-per-cent Goods and Services Tax from books. He also said the Liberals would not tamper with the level of transfer payments to the provinces for education.

A Liberal government would also make sure any tuition fee increases at the provincial level would not take place, Harb said.

Student reaction to McKenna's talk was mixed. Many commented on the new Liberal plan McKenna endorsed, which includes major spending to create jobs through improving infrastructure—roads, sewers and other public works.

Steve Dolorenski said he liked McKenna "but the Liberals' proposed plan to rebuild infrastructure... is not our main concern right now. It's the high taxes that are killing jobs and preventing businesses from hiring people."

Meredith Armstrong agreed, saying "it was interesting having him at school, but I am going to support the Conservatives, so I don't feel that building roads and infrastructure is going to help the country."

However, John Manning said he thought McKenna did a great job at addressing education-related issues. "I was enlightened by the fact that they would remove the GST on books."

David Gourlay, president of the Carleton Young Liberals, said he was pleased with the interest shown by the students who came to the event.

When asked if he brought McKenna to Carleton in response to Harb losing at all four residence polls in the last election, Gourlay said he invited McKenna because he is one of the top premiers in Canada and he has an excellent social and economic track record.

As to the residence poll results in the last election, Gourlay said, "It is a concern of ours... I'm not going to say that we expect to take it all. We're not, but we are going to do what we can."

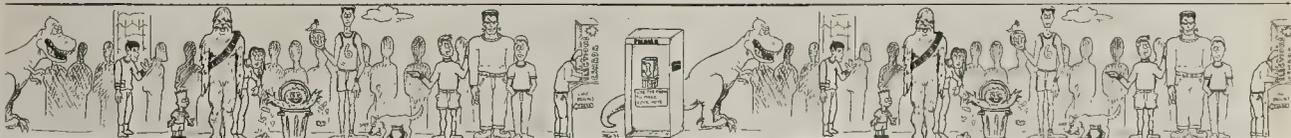

Harb also said he wants to do a lot of campaigning on campus because of his poor showing here in the last election, adding he is concerned about students.

Harb said the Tory record on education has been poor.

"We want to remind students... that the Tories have not delivered on their promises."

Harb also criticized the NDP's Ottawa Centre candidate Marion Dewar. He said students "should not forget what the NDP did to them in Ontario by increasing tuition fees." □

Student groups join the election fray

by Sara-Lynne Levine
Charlatan Staff

With the federal election less than three weeks away, the Carleton University Students' Association is switching into campaign mode.

On Oct. 5, CUSA began its campaign to promote student issues and awareness with the help of the Canadian Federation of Students, a national student lobby group.

CUSA President Lucy Watson says it is "imperative that we start to address the concerns of the 450,000 students across Canada. That is a substantial voting block that is being ignored."

Watson says CUSA and the CFS have developed a variety of strategies to inform students about election issues.

Kristine Haselsteiner, CUSA vice-president external, says the students' association has budgeted $4,995 for its campaign expenses. CUSA is getting no financial help from CFS, which has only $15,000 to spend on a national campaign, Haselsteiner says.

On Oct. 5, a table with election information was set up in Baker Lounge. Watson says the table includes the voter's guide published by the Nation Action Committee on the Status of Women and letters about student issues for people to send to candidates. The table will be set up each day until after the election on Oct. 25.

Beginning on Oct. 5, Watson says

CFS chair Gillis: "investing in education."

students can play phone tag with the candidates every Tuesday using free telephones set up by CUSA in Baker Lounge.

"Students will have access to telephones so they can call candidates in their riding and ask questions about what they propose to do about education," says Watson. The phone campaign is happening at universities all over Ontario, she says.

As well, every Thursday from now until the election, CUSA will encourage students to use its phones to call the local media. Watson says this is important because "students can ask the media why they are not addressing student issues."

As well, Watson says, "CUSA is putting together a voting guide with facts on education and other student concerns as well as commonly asked questions with answers."

Tracie Osler, a first-year journalism student, says she thinks CUSA's campaign will help students make an informed decision. But she says the money CUSA is spending may be a bit too much.

"I don't know if I'd put that much into it," she says.

Osler says she thinks student issues have been adequately addressed in the election campaign so far.

Jane Christie, an English and women's studies major in second-year, disagrees, saying politicians "don't really address students and we're the first people to get cut."

She says CUSA's campaign is good to motivate students to vote, but could probably be conducted for less.

From Sept. 26 to Sept. 28, Watson and Haselsteiner attended a national CFS conference outside Toronto to discuss election strategy.

"Approximately 80 student representatives from across the country came to discuss election strategy," says CFS chair Carl Gillis.

The conference included information seminars on student assistance, access to universities and summer employment programs. It ended with a free public concert called Rock the Vote, which featured Bob Wiseman, the Bourbon Tabernacle Choir and Scott Thompson. Gillis says there were about 300 or 400 hundred people at the Opera House in Toronto.

He says all the artists played for free and the Opera House donated the theatre for the night. He says it was "great to get the message out and it was very well received."

According to Watson, the conference was very "motivational, it really got us going."

Watson says ads will be placed in The Charlatan and the Ottawa Citizen encouraging student voting. As well, the CFS is running a national advertising campaign on television, radio and in newspapers.

Gillis says the focus of the CFS ads is "bringing attention to investing in education and how it makes sense to invest in youth, people and education." □

First Nations group makes trek to Parliament

"We walked 700 kilometres for our home."

Clifford George was referring to the arrival on Parliament Hill of about 50 members of the Stoney Point First Nations band, some of whom walked 729 km from the shores of Lake Huron to demand their reservation back.

The three-square-mile reservation was taken from them by the Department of National Defence in 1942 under the War Measures Act and never returned. The band was uprooted and forced to join the Kettle Island reservation, two miles away.

On May 5, 1993, the band re-occupied the reservation and in August there was an incident where shots were fired at a Canadian Forces helicopter. The inci-

Canada in 1942 when the Canadian military first took over the land because the War Measures Act gave it the power to seize property. He said he received a letter from his father saying the army had taken over the land but the band would get it back when the war was over.

"The government tries to divide and conquer the people," said band councillor Glen George. "We went to war so the people could be free. But we found out the government was the real enemy because they took our homes."

Stoney Point band elder Rose Manning said she was 10 when she and her family was forcefully evicted from their reservation.

"The public has a right to know if the government will respond," he said.

Defence minister Tom Siddon said in a letter to NDP Aboriginal affairs critic Robert Skelly in August that the military was still using the land and would return it when they are finished.

Carleton elder-in-residence Wilfred Peltier said he helped cook food and took it out to the walkers Sept. 29 when they were staying at the Nepean Tent and Trailer Park.

Peltier said there was little support from Native groups such as the Native Council of Canada and the Assembly of First Nations. He also said the timing of the march was bad.

"It was very bad timing, with the election going on and they didn't get any press attention," he said.

Murray Angus, communications co-ordinator for the Native Council of Canada, confirmed there was no involvement by the organization and it was not represented on the Hill.

"We were occupied on other fronts. Our energies were spent elsewhere," he said.

Angus said the council was involved in preparing criticisms of the federal parties for ignoring Native issues during the campaign and the leaders' debates.

While waiting for a government response, the band plans to return to its land and continue occupying the reserve.

Some students wary of Liberals' Youth Corps proposal: will the government have the cash?

by Jennifer Boyle
Charlatan Staff

Some Carleton students are critical in their reviews of the youth corps proposal released last month by the federal Liberal party.

Liberal leader Jean Chrétien released a proposal Sept. 21 to create a Canadian Youth Corps he says will provide much-needed jobs, training and experience.

The Liberals propose, if elected, to invest $100 million per year by the third year of the youth program and expect that 10,000 youth would participate each year.

Youth Corps participants from ages 15 to 24 would spend up to a one-year term assisting in community projects such as the tourism industry, services for senior citizens, environmental projects and local literacy projects.

The costs of food, lodging, transportation and training would be covered by the program and participants would also receive a weekly allowance for personal expenses.

Mac Harb, Liberal candidate for Ottawa Centre, says he believes the Youth Corps would benefit Ottawa's two universities and community college tremendously.

"The bottom line is that it is a strategy by the Liberal party that could get our youth back on track," Harb says. "More than anything, we have to invest in our youth."

But at Carleton, some students had mixed reviews.

Sean Carson, a second-year history major, says he believes the idea of a Youth Corps is only a "farce."

"When you look at it clearly and cut through all the crap, there really is not much that is new here. It is window dressing for old ideas... let's slap a new label on it and call it the Youth Corps," he said.

Sean Kidd, a second-year psychology student, says "Youth training programs are basically a good idea, but they are only profitable in an economy in which the training can actually be put into practice."

The proposal also calls for the establishment of a community service council to co-ordinate federal support for the work projects and establish the guidelines for selection of participants.

The program would be financed with no new money, according to the proposal, but through the reallocation of existing federal budgets.

As well, a Liberal government would solicit donations from community groups and companies who could benefit from the training the participants would receive.

Big bucks for beer? Blame the government

by Richard G.D. Scott
Charlatan Staff

Beer drinkers looking for a greater variety will be pleased to find an increased flow of American brands coming into Canadian beer stores.

But those looking for cheaper beer prices will have to wait for a change in the Ontario government's policies.

Beer prices in the United States are about three-fifths of the cost of beer in Canada. That's because of a tariff battle between the provincial governments and the American government as well as the monopoly on beer sales in Canada.

Beer prices in the United States are about three-fifths of the cost of beer in Canada.

market themselves, some American companies now have their brands brewed and distributed in Canada by Canadian companies.

So, although provincial governments have budgeted little on foreign beer policies and tariffs, U.S. brands have finally won access to provincial beer stores.

Provincial beer taxes, however, are still being levied on American beer companies. Even with the Free Trade Agreement in place, U.S. companies are faced with stiff surcharges in Ontario, the site of about one-third of all beer sales in Canada.

In May 1992, the NDP government issued a 10-cent environmental tax on beer cans to increase the use of bottles even though cans are just as easily recycled. Bottles are far more expensive to transport and U.S. beer companies have been susceptible to the tough Ontario levy because of their use of cans.

In August, the Ontario government changed beer pricing systems from a minimum flat rate for all beers to a price reflective of alcohol content. This was done in response to American complaints to GATT.

Regular Canadian beer price minimums were dropped to $23.70 for a case of 24 bottles from $24.95, while light beers now start from $22.80.

The minimum price in Ontario for U.S. brands, which contain less alcohol than regular Canadian brews, is now $23.15 for 24 bottles and $26.55 for 24 cans. Stroh is the first U.S.

brewer to directly enter the Ontario Beer Stores and is selling their Old Milwaukee beer at $26.90 for 24 cans.

These lower prices, however, fall far short of some early anticipation that price drops from free trade would be as much as one-quarter of the average beer price.

There are two explanations for the higher Canadian prices, besides tariffs. Some market analysts blame the provincial government's theory that higher beer prices will translate into less drinking. The other reason is that Brewers' Retail Stores, the major Ontario distributor, is owned by the two Canadian brewing front-runners, Labatt and Molson.

Some market analysts blame the provincial government's theory that higher beer prices will translate into less drinking.

There is no such monopoly in the States. Instead, American brewers ship beer independently to different supermarkets and corner stores, as well as beer stores. The result is a competitive market with cheaper prices.

Maybe Canadian beer stores and provincial governments can make a move to do the same. □

Government slammed in local issues fair

by Anthony Pangalos
Charlatan Staff

Talk of grassroots politics and disappointment in politicians dominated an afternoon-long discussion held by Ottawa-area interest groups on Oct. 3 at the Sandy Hill Community Centre.

Organized by the Ottawa Coalition for Social Justice, "Agenda Day" was an opportunity for community members and various interest groups to exchange views on election issues, including post-secondary education.

Many speakers expressed dismay at the widening division between the public and politicians.

"Government doesn't care and government is getting farther away from the people," said Linda Lalonde of the Social Assistance Recipient Council, a lobby group representing people on social assistance.

"Government doesn't care and government is getting farther away from the people."

--Linda Lalonde

Also on hand were organizations such as the Ottawa and District Labor Council, the Coalition to Oppose the Arms Trade and the Ontario Public Interest Research Group. About 45 people visited the community centre to pick up information and hear speakers. "This is an opportunity for us to pull it all together and have one forum where people can present the materials they have developed for the election," said Debbie Ferren, a social justice coalition member.

Social justice groups discussed election issues in Sandy Hill.

Post-secondary education was a major issue at the event. According to the Canadian Federation of Students, the government has cut $6.8 billion in federal transfer payments to provinces and territories since 1986.

The result of the lost revenue is, "a deterioration of buildings, less courses offered, overcrowded classrooms, inadequate libraries and a reduction in research and development," said Carole Sauvé, vice-president external of the Student Federation of the University of Ottawa, who represented CFS.

About 41 per cent of students rely on student loans and they are also affected by less government funding, said Sauvé.

"They (the Tories) are becoming less and less involved with the administration of student loans because they are handing it over to the banks," she said. "Students will have to go negotiate their loans and (the banks) will take into consideration the courses and the financial situation of that student."

Day care for students was also on the agenda "because the government failed to implement a new subsidization policy," said Sauvé. "There is very little space to absorb the mothers with children."

At Carleton, a new day-care facility is being built but the waiting list for subsidized day care is two and a half years.

Another issue Sauvé raised was student unemployment.

"Over the past summer 20 per cent of students were unemployed," said Sauvé. "193,000 jobs were lost between 1985 and 1992."

Marja Kagis from the Somerset West Community Health Care Centre said cuts to transfer payments to the provinces is hurting health care.

The federal government "pays one-quarter of the cost of health care," Kagis said. "The government downloaded the public debt onto the provinces."

Cuts to Canadian social assistance plans, such as daycare, welfare, social housing and unemployment insurance, were discussed by Lalonde. Instead of continuing inequality, "society should pick these people up and help them," she said.

Only two candidates for the election — NDP candidates Marion Dewar (Ottawa Centre) and Willie Dunn (Ottawa East) — made an appearance at the community centre although all were invited, according to Judi Varga-Doth, coordinator of OPIRG at University of Ottawa.

Other groups and organizations that were represented included the East Timor Alert Network, the Great Canadian Theatre Company, and the Political Action Committee.

AIDS AWARENESS WEEK OCTOBER 4 - 10, 1993

ARE YOU HAVING SEX IN THE DARK?

Some say ignorance is bliss.

When it comes to sex, ignorance is far from bliss. It's just plain dangerous.

If you want to do the smart thing, get out of the dark.

Find out how HIV/AIDS and other STDs are transmitted.

Use condoms. Not occasionally, not usually, but always.

Talk. Talk to your partner. Your friends. Your doctor.

If you're embarrassed about buying condoms, remember that after you've bought them once it will be much easier. Being embarrassed is a small price to pay for your health.

If you know someone with HIV infection or AIDS, reach out to them and break the silence. No more fear. No more ignorance.

Six minutes with sock puppets

Try to address 2,000 years of racist, sexist, patriarchal culture in six minutes.

We don't think so.

And obviously neither does the department of athletics.

The department has produced a video for $1,000 which is supposed to educate new and returning athletes about racism, sexism, violence and homophobia. But last week, director of athletics Keith Harris said he thought the video wasn't capable of challenging "deep-rooted convictions" about these issues.

After seeing it, we tend to agree.

All athletes must watch the video as part of a seminar discussing the use of steroids and other performance-enhancing drugs. Then they must sign a statement saying they took part in the seminar.

The video was produced in the wake of last year's investigation into a chant book of explicit sexually violent, racist and homophobic chants allegedly used by the rugby team. Two years ago, the university found that the lacrosse club had chanted similarly sexually violent songs late at night in September of 1991.

While we agree with Harris that a video isn't enough, we think it could at least have been a starting point. A video which actually deals with why racism, sexism and homophobia are harmful, followed up with a discussion, could have gone a lot further in challenging athletes' beliefs.

Making people think is far more effective than just telling people not to do something because it's "today's taboo," as Harris called racism, sexism and homophobia in an interview with The Charlatan last week. That's just sweeping hate under the carpet where it will continue to fester and poison the atmosphere at Carleton.

This is exactly what the video does, dismissing discriminatory and harassing behavior in a few short sound bites from our illustrious leader, Carleton President Robin Farquhar, and his sidekick Harris.

In the video, both have as much personality as badly made sock puppets.

First they massage the athletes' egos, calling them "the most physically skilled athletes on the entire campus." Athletes are told they are looked up to as "leaders" on campus.

Then Farquhar addresses the burning question of campus landscaping, saying "what an attractive physical setting" we have at Carleton. He also mentions our "fine library" and resource centres.

Oh yeah. He says that sometimes bad things happen too.

In the video, Harris talks about how an unspecified team chanted "vulgar songs" at an unspecified "some time ago." By leaving the event this vague, it is easy to ignore the entire incident. It's easy for new athletes, especially new rugby team members, to miss the connection. The video makes it seem like it was somebody else's team.

Both talking heads mouth some platitudes about how "to learn, we must be free, and to be free you must not be afraid — of abuse, or harassment, or ridicule or discrimination of any kind," and how "it is essential that we conduct ourselves as a non-violent community."

One can't help but think how these hard-hitting lectures would be received by a room full of athletes who have been given an ultimatum — watch this and sign a paper saying you saw it, or you can't play.

No doubt they would all be hanging on Sparky's every word.

But if the video is, as Harris says, only to "introduce" athletes to the issues of sexism, racism and homophobia, we suppose it doesn't matter if they watch it or not.

The $1,000 it's expected to cost to produce the video could have been much better spent on seminars led by people who have experience dealing with racism, sexism and homophobia.

It's not enough to tell someone what they're doing is wrong. You have to tell them why it's wrong.

It's much harder to dismiss someone who's in your face.

Six minutes with Farquhar and Harris doesn't cut it.

Health care system isn't a 7-11

by Steven Pruner

Steven Pruner is a second-year masters of social work student at Carleton

Re: "Health system needs help," The Charlatan, Sept. 23, 1993.

Clayton Wood may very well have the economic resources at his disposal to purchase health care, but what about the rest of us who cannot afford to privately buy it?

Wood says he would like to have eye surgery when it is convenient for him — before he goes to Europe. But health care should not necessarily be like going to a convenience store to have needs immediately satisfied. Universal health care should be about equal access, not about jumping the line because one has the money.

If I needed eye surgery at a cost of $3,000 or more, I'd be waiting a long time before I could afford it. In a true free market economy, I would have to forgo eye surgery.

We ALL benefit from universal health care and other social programs. Without them, any attempt to create equal opportunities, regardless of social class, is lost, only to be replaced by Darwin's "survival of the fittest" principle.

For health care, this would mean that those who can afford it will have the best care and those who can't afford it will have to make do with a lower quality of care.

Wood is suggesting that we create a two-tier health care system — a lower tier that provides "basic" services for everyone and a higher tier of first-class premium services for those who can afford to pay for it. I have some concerns with this kind of system.

Wood suggests instituting a model similar to Great Britain's. This is not a good idea. One needs only to look at what is happening there now: those who can afford private insurance receive the fastest and best quality of care while those who are dependent on the public health system often have to wait.

Many British doctors, particularly specialists, have opted out of the public health system to set up their own private practice to make more money. As more doctors opt out of the public system, who will be left to provide service for those who can't afford private care?

If a system like Great Britain's was used in Canada, I imagine the same thing would happen.

Based on my understanding of how money works in our economy, the best physicians and the best medical equipment and care would naturally gravitate towards the higher tier. The rest of us would have to make do with the "basics" that would be available in the lower tier.

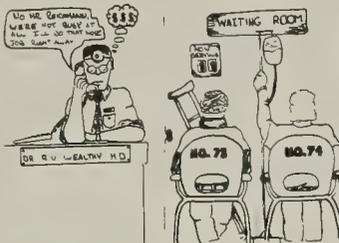

Knowing the kind of assistance that society affords the poor through social service programs, I can only imagine that "basic services" would mean the absolute minimum. That minimum would mean a longer wait for services provided by doctors who lack the necessary skills and talents to make it in private practice. Granted, there would be some altruistic doctors who would remain in the public system, but how many would really stay?

If reform is needed in our health care system, let's look at other issues first. For example, the overuse and abuse of services; the incredible prices charged by pharmaceutical and medical equipment suppliers who make huge profits; the oversupply of medical professionals who encourage overuse of the system through unnecessary tests and interventions; and lack of resources in the community to practise preventative medicine to stop illness before it starts.

In addition to this, the majority of our health care dollars are spent during the first few years and the final few years of one's life. Why are we spending thousands upon thousands of dollars unnecessarily replacing hips and knees in people who are in nursing homes dying of other illnesses from which they will never recover? Many of them won't benefit from getting new hips and knees.

We must get our priorities right. Medical interventions that enhance and prolong the quality of life should come first.

Wood writes that "the days of unrealistic and unaffordable social programs are over." I guess we should say goodbye to universal health care, unemployment insurance, income assistance and pensions, too. Maybe it's time we cut the rope, sink or swim. I hope not.

Hurray for hemp!

Editor:
We found your article on the legalization of marijuana (The Charlatan, Sept. 16, 1993) to be far too heavily focused on hemp's use as a recreational drug. There are far more significant social and environmental benefits to be had by legalizing hemp.

For example, hemp fibre is an ecologically and economically healthy source for paper and fibre board. According to the Business Alliance for Commerce in Hemp, "one acre of hemp produces as much pulp as 4.1 acres of forest."

Hemp also has a variety of useful medical applications. Dr. Lester Grinspon and James B. Bakalar discuss these uses in their book Marijuana, the Forbidden Medicine, describing the effects of marijuana on glaucoma, migraines, menstrual cramps, chronic pain, asthma, mood disorders and other conditions.

Hemp seed is a good food source as well — "second only to soybeans in nutritional value," according to the Whole Earth Review.

It's not just "potheads" calling for the legalization of hemp. The Globe and Mail, ("Canadian farmers' pipe dream?" April 12, 1993), says "the head of the largest provincial farmers' group is asking the federal government to lift its 70-year-old ban on hemp . . . citing the economic potential it holds for the beleaguered agricultural sector."

Although your article did touch on some of these uses, it barely scratched the surface and readers are not directed towards more detailed writings on the debate. The Hemp and Herb Working Group at OPIRG Carleton is slowly compiling a file of articles on hemp and its legalization. We urge your readers both to bring in (or suggest) to us their own favorite articles on hemp, and to read the articles on hemp presently in the OPIRG resource centre.

Tasteless 'toon

Editor:
As the writer of the opinion piece "What the poster didn't say," The Charlatan, Sept. 30, 1993, I met with the editor of that section several times. When I saw my article in print, and read the graphic placed in the middle of the text, I was horrified.

The graphic was tasteless, and although it was perhaps meant as a satirical piece of humor to accent the concerns raised by my article, it had the opposite effect.

In fact, many of my colleagues were confused as to the meaning of the graphic and I had no answers to offer.

The victim of the original attempted assault was distressed over the lack of judgment that The Charlatan displayed. In addition, we were both alarmed that after reading my article, the graphic artist felt it was necessary to blame campus security for the poster. If the artist would have done minimal research and read the security poster, he/she would have realized campus security does not have its extension number on the poster.

In fact, campus security's responding officer, Michael Warner, was helpful, sensitive, and active on the victim's behalf. Campus security deserves much more recognition and support than they currently receive.

If I would have known that such a juvenile, uninformed attempt at humor would accompany my article, I would not have allowed it to be printed. The Charlatan may now add its name to the agencies which perpetuate the secondary trauma that makes victims of assault hesitate when faced with the decision to pursue the apprehension of their aggressors.

Graphic ridicules

Editor:
That hideous "warning" plastered in the middle of Jason Ramsay's serious editorial, ("What the poster didn't say," The Charlatan, Sept. 30, 1993), disgusted me. The thrilling ad about the return of Freddy the Flasher. The individual responsible for such hate literature used words like "tickle" and "harmless." Sexual assault is not tickling or harmless, it is violent — violating.

I pose a question to The Charlatan staff who permitted the publication of such repugnant journalism: Would any of you confront the woman or any woman who was brutally assaulted with these words to her face?

It is much easier to remain anonymous and hide behind deadlines, throwing journalistic responsibility and ethics to the wind. Imagine yourselves looking into the eyes of a sexually assaulted woman, what would you say? "No cause for alarm . . ." Yeah, now that he has disappeared for the time being, yet such words do not heal pain.

Instead of drawing attention to the critical problem of campus safety, The Charlatan ridiculed it, alienating an assaulted woman and all of those women who endure, violating their bodies even further, not with a penis, but with words.

Dan - he's everywhere

Editor:
Unicentre = boring. Aykroyd Centre = flair.

Why? Why not!
I think that the Dan Aykroyd Student Centre is a fine name. It sounds much better than the plain old Unicentre.

Here are 10 good reasons to rename the centre:

1. He was a student in good standing.
 2. His parents contribute regularly and generously to CKCU.
 3. We have a better chance at getting him to visit Carleton than getting Bruce Springsteen, or anyone else.
 4. He went to my old high school on Fisher Avenue, St. Pius X.
 5. People of Ottawa should make up for the Paul Anka scandal.
 6. He brings laughter through movies (I have an illegal copy of Ghostbusters).
 7. He did do something with his life.
 8. One of our frosh groups this year was named after a skit he did about the Boss-o-matic.
 9. I haven't heard any better suggestions.
 10. If we wait until he's dead we'll still have a boring student centre name.
- So, you see, he's everywhere. He's famous. So what if he was a bit of a troublemaker. Students can relate to his image and I bet they even like the name too.
- I think it would be a nice change. Maybe next year we can name our frosh groups after movies he's been in.

Learn the lingo

Editor:
Re: "Scotiabank only place to sock your loot," The Charlatan, Sept. 23, 1993.

An error was made by Tanya Workman in her article which outlined student packages offered by several chartered banks.

Workman stated that the Toronto-Dominion Bank's student plan offers "no-charge withdrawals and deposits . . . and two free cheques per month . . ." What Workman neglected to mention is that no-charge withdrawals are only no-charge when made through the bank's automated teller machines.

Upon further investigation, Workman would have found that the plan offers two free cheques or in-branch withdrawals per month. "In-branch withdrawal" is a withdrawal processed by a teller. Therefore, a student can only make two such debit transactions: two cheques, two in-branch withdrawals or one cheque and one in-branch withdrawal per month. Any subsequent debit transactions not made through the bank's automated teller machines will be subject to service charges.

It is to the benefit of the students, when shopping around from financial institution to financial institution, to have bank lingo explained and to have understood all applicable service charges. This will eliminate or lessen unpleasant surprises, frustration and time consumption.

Bike racks lacking at Loeb

Editor:
As I was locking my bike to a parking meter outside the Loeb building, a campus security officer came up and ordered me to unlock my bike immediately. I told him that the one-and-only bike rack in the immediate area was full and that there was nowhere else to lock my bike. He said that he didn't care, and that I had to move my bike. Parking meters cost a lot you see, and my bike might damage it.

My bike costs a lot of money too, and I'm not prepared to sacrifice it so that a parking meter may remain unscuffed.

Perhaps it would be in the university's best interest to invest in a few more bike racks, since I'm not the only one who has to lock my bike to a parking meter on a regular basis.

Waiting list woes

Editor:
Re: "Health system needs help," The Charlatan, Sept. 23, 1993.

Clayton Wood, in his opinion piece on the Canadian health care system, says that he is concerned about the quality of our health care. However, when you read what he has written you see that what he is really concerned with is the waiting list for services.

While I agree that this is a problem, I do not feel that the solution lies in offering bribes to bud in line.

His system of paying for "better" service would not work to shorten lines or improve service for the majority of users. It would only mean that those people with money would get priority while the rest of us are pushed further down the list.

What is needed is better and faster health care services for everyone, not just the wealthy.

Re: "Who needs a life?" The Charlatan, Sept. 23, 1993, by John Greenwood a.k.a. Grimm.

I'm glad you like stories about me -- I do too! I've got a life and no longer go to Oliver's. I didn't even realize that I was there. In fact, I thought I was at my third cousin's wedding in Smiths Falls. The music was the same -- who knew? I was just waiting for my great-uncle Orville to come and ask me to dance a jig. I did come to my senses and told the DJ (if you can call him that), the music sucked. Don't you remember, John? Keep spinnin' those tunes -- go, grease lighting!

Access for all essential

Editor:

This letter is in response to "Health system needs help," The Charlatan, Sept. 23, 1993. An article such as this saddens me more than anything else. It is unfortunate that certain Canadians such as Clayton Wood fail to realize that we do have one of the best and most accessible medical systems in the world.

Wood talks about the inefficiency of our "crumbling" system. Again, this is partially true. The health system is currently in a state of financial instability across the country. However, this is not because our system is too costly in general. It is because hospitals, particularly in Ontario, have been mismanaged.

People have also used our system to obtain many services they don't need.

Even with this, our system is still more cost efficient than the U.S. health care system.

To say that we should adopt a health care system like Great Britain is complete rubbish. The national health system in England is a very inferior system to ours. No one there with any capital uses it. This is because all the good physicians are in private health care.

I am not trying to say that our system does not have problems. It is obvious that it does. Yet the basic principle of access to all in such an important thing as health care is really the only way to go. With better administration and understanding we can make our system cost efficient and long-lasting.

An Interview with poet and playwright Joseph Dandurand

by Rob McLennan
Charalatan Staff

Joseph Dandurand is a 28-year-old local poet and playwright. He is a Salish Indian originally from Fort Langley, B.C., and up until September was living and writing in Texas for four months.

Dandurand returned to Ottawa with a performance of a short scene, Touches, as part of the SAW Gallery's "Rushes" series, held every third Sunday to showcase works-in-progress by local artists.

His first performance was a reading of his play No Totem for My Story, as part of an evening of Native story-telling on Sept. 24, 1992, by the Theatre Distinct Theatre Company at the University of Ottawa.

His second reading was of his play Crackers and Soup, at the National Arts Centre Atelier Theatre last April.

He will be presenting the first full-length production of one of his own plays Where Two Rivers Meet, by his fledgling One Crow's Theatre Company at the SAW Gallery on Oct. 28, 29 and 30.

Dandurand's most recent, and only, chapbook is titled The Upside Down Raven. A poetry chapbook is a thin booklet of poetry, usually made up on a photocopier and stapled together by the author.

Dandurand is part of a collective of Native writers called the Writer's Independent Native Organization (WINO), a group which encourages and supports Native writers in the Ottawa region.

He is also one of four interns taking part in the Aboriginal Training Program in Museology at the Museum of Civilization in Hull. The program is designed to give those who are developing their own cultural centres or museums on Native and Inuit reserves the training to gain greater control over the presentation and preservation of their own cultural histories.

Dandurand will be working closely with David Parry, who is head of interpretive programs at the museum, on various writing projects including a theatrical presentation on some of the pieces in the Great Hall, such as the Kwakwak'wakw feast dish.

Parry says he is confident the eight-month program will culminate in a completed theatrical presentation to be performed as part of an international symposium, called Languages of Live Interpretation, at the museum next May. After that, the performance will be open to the public.

I was finally able to catch up with Joseph in the middle of his busy schedule over breakfast two weeks ago. The following is from an hour of interview, between cups of bad coffee.

Dandurand: What am I doing? I'm working on a play I've written, producing it at SAW Gallery. It runs the 28, 29, 30 of October. It's called Where Two Rivers Meet and it's kind of a spiritual thing. It's not really Native. Very deeply spiritual. It's about love. I'm trying to finish a book of poetry, four poems short and I'm also finishing some plays that are half-finished.

McLennan: Tell me about your internship at the Museum of Civilization.

Dandurand: Yeah, I'm starting there on September 30, but getting there on the 15th, doing some work for them, working on a symposium for children and some other things. Basically, I'm there to work with their theatre company, to create stories, and to learn. It's a learning experience for eight months. And from there, I've applied to go to York University, to study plays, to get my masters in playwriting, so hopefully I can teach someday. At Ottawa U, I finished my BA in theatre.

McLennan: Have you produced any previous work?

Dandurand: I haven't produced any (plays). I've produced some readings and some workshops, that's about it. This is the first full-length production. This play, actually, the NAC bought the rights to it. Yeah, just until January, they gave me a thousand dollars and they want a copy of the script when it's done. Which is cool, you know. It's a good theatre.

McLennan: Why is this only your first full-length play?

Dandurand: Why? Why not? I think it's because I've been waiting for people to produce my work and it hasn't happened in this city, so I decided to create a theatre company and produce this play, which is my own work.

The theatre group is loosely based on theatre groups in the sixties, the voice of their generation, and that's what we all are, because I'm the oldest and the other people in the company are in their early twenties, so we're just fresh, and want to do something outside university theatre. Almost sort of semi-professional. Make a run at it, you know?

McLennan: You told me once that you have moved around a lot.

Dandurand: I've been around. I've been in Ottawa for 10 years. My dad was in the air force and ended up here, but my mother's family is from B.C., a reservation called Fort Langley. It's nice, a little island on the Fraser River — good fishing. Salish, Stolo Nation. My mother is a full-blooded Indian and my dad's French.

McLennan: How has that influenced your work?

Dandurand: It has in the sense that I can write in both perspectives and not have to justify either of them. The characters in my plays take on a . . . they can have either race — they can be white, or they can be Native. It's not a story about race, it's a story about human beings, I guess.

McLennan: *From what I've seen of your poetry, your first chapbook The Upside Down Raven, I was wondering about your use of Native mythology in your work.*

Dandurand: I love writing about animals, is that what you mean? I just love it. I think it's just so easy to do. That's when I'm at my most comfortable.

Right now I'm finishing a book of poetry called Running Boy, Where Did You Go? (I'm) four poems short, (I have) about 40 I guess. It's about a young Indian boy running around the world from his reservation, in a big circle.

I guess half my plays are Native, that would mean Native actors. That's one of the biggest problems I have, living in Ottawa, is the lack of Native actors, so I do my other plays. I'm still involved in WIND. We have an anthology coming out. I'm not sure when, we're still working on it . . . no, it's done. They just need enough money to print it.

That's with six other writers, such as Anne Arco, Alan Leary. Yeah, we've been together for years. Writer's Independent Native Organization.

It's a group that originally got together to workshop each other's works, and basically now is just an organization that promotes Native writing in the Ottawa area. And we do the Ottawa Valley Book Festival every year. And other things, (like) help each other with our books, and that. They helped me with my first chapbook.

McLennan: Do you see a lot of people interested in Native writing?

Dandurand: Yeah, I guess so. Yeah, there's a market for it, you know, that whole granola thing. Walk down Glebe, there, I could probably sell all my books there. I think there is a voice. We're searching for it. I'm searching for mine. Art is art, right?

McLennan: I've noticed in your plays you use a lot of angry characters.

Dandurand: (Laughter) Why, I don't know. Anger? I wouldn't say they're angry. I'd say they're frustrated. It's what I see, I guess. I just think that as a new writer, it's much easier to write characters like that, instead of someone who's compassionate and weak. Passive, yeah. I don't know, I don't find them as interesting as someone who's got an edge to them, y'know? Who's ready to fight the world.

McLennan: Crackers and Soup, what was that?

Dandurand: Crackers and Soup was definitely anger. That's weird. I don't know how you write, but when I write plays, when I write poetry, it's like an escape for me. It's like a different world, so it's hard for me to talk about it right now.

Whenever I write a play, I go into that world for a week, or whatever it takes for me to write one, and I'm there, and then I come out of it and I try to get back into it. But that's what my plays are. They're dreams.

McLennan: Do you escape into anger?

Dandurand: Sure. Why not? I hold it in all the way through life, might as well escape into it.

McLennan: Are you angry?

Dandurand: Am I? Isn't everybody? (Laughter) Why am I angry? Oh, I feel like I'm being analyzed here. Why am I angry, why am I angry. I don't know, I just am. I just always have been. There's no profound reason for my anger, I guess.

I'm not always angry. God, I try to write serious plays and when I stage them, halfway through them people are laughing, you know, laughing at the wrong moment. I'm sitting there almost crying, and they're sitting there laughing. Which is great, because I think that's one of the reasons I write plays, is to sit there in the audience and watch people react. That's what I enjoy doing, creating a reaction. You know, whether it's anger, or compassion for my characters, sympathy or empathy.

I've seen a lot of plays. I love going into a theatre. That's what it's all about, the act of illusion, the art of creating a new world.

That's why I write plays, because I want to create an hour of escape for people and try, once the script is there, and then as a director, to create this world by using the set and the lighting and the actors and staging a world for them.

It's hard, for at any moment they might snap out of it and realize, "Hey, I'm watching a play," you know, it isn't real. So that's why I enjoy writing and trying to perfect the art of telling a story, making it as real as possible.

I've seen almost everything in the city — try not to pay, go to previews and GTC Sundays, pay what you can, take two bucks, pay a buck and buy a Nanaimo bar with the other dollar. But other companies that are failing I pay. I pay the full price to help them out. That's what it's all about.

I'm harmless. God, I'm harmless. (Laughter) I was in Europe for four years, Winnipeg for seven . . .

McLennan: Do you think this has anything with your need to escape?

Dandurand: No, I escape because I'm crazy. (Laughter) I have to write. My head feels like it will explode if I don't write. It's weird. I just gotta write when I can't deal with things. One day I'll go to an analyst who will tell me I'm sane. For now, I'll play the manic.

McLennan: Are you making any sort of living from this?

Dandurand: No, I've got to make money other ways. I work as a professional stage hand at the National Arts Theatre. I've been there for four years.

It's great. I see things there, I see how it's done, and when I go to produce things, I know exactly how it's done. The greatest formula for theatre, for writing, is to keep it simple. You know, use what you've got. We got the space at SAW Gallery for free. Scrounged my set-up, just collecting favors, just knowing people who owe me favors. Yeah, it's running three days, then I'll pack it. It fits 125 people in there, five dollars a head. I have the theatre community, the literary community, people who like my stuff. Well, maybe not like my stuff but appreciate it, I guess. It's great. It's what I need.

I'm going to apply for an Explorations grant (from the Ontario Arts Council for new artists). The next deadline is January 15, so I am going to do that. And, I don't know.

I might try Thelus Books (to publish the poetry manuscript), which is a Native publishing company out West, see if they'll jump at it. I'll probably end up self-publishing it, you know.

Rob McLennan is a poet who lives and writes in Ottawa. His last last chapbook was entitled August. He also edits, publishes and distributes the Free Verse Anthology, as well as being a co-editor of the Carleton Arts Review.

Ravens bombed in loss to third-ranked Bishop's Gaiters

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

It's about time they lost. After two straight dramatic come-from-behind victories, the bubble burst on the Carleton Ravens football team.

No miracle finish. No win. Just a 34-1 trouncing at the hands of the Bishop's Gaiters on Oct. 2 at Raven Field.

Bishop's 34 Carleton 1

With the loss, the 2-2 Ravens fall into a three-way tie for second place in the Ontario-Quebec Interuniversity Football Conference with the McGill Redmen and the Concordia Stingers. Bishop's improves to 4-0 and, with three games remaining in the season, has first place virtually locked up.

"I hope the guys will remember how this feels," said Raven wide receiver James Tickell, who led the team offensively with 59 yards on three receptions. "It feels shitty. If we can remember this feeling, maybe we won't let it happen again. Maybe we just thought we didn't have to go out and work hard for the win. But that's not true. We have to practise hard and play hard like we did last week (in a 25-20 win against Queen's)."

True to past form, the Ravens started slowly, allowing the Gaiters to build a 17-0 halftime lead.

"It seems every game we try to play catch-up," said Tickell. "And against good teams like Bishop's, you can't do that."

No kidding. "Past history dictates this team doesn't believe they're ever out of it," said Bishop's coach Ian Breck. "They showed a lot of confidence to come from behind and beat Ottawa and Queen's. That's a significant accomplishment. We knew we had to take control and get out at them."

And Bishop's did just that when they stuffed a Raven third and goal drive late in the third quarter, preserving a comfortable 17-1 lead.

"It would have been a big score," said Raven running back Einard Jean-

Let's see, three Gaiters pummeling one Raven -- no wonder we lost.

Francois, who had the ball knocked out of his hands in the end zone on the play. "It would have brought us up. Instead we made mistakes that made us look bad. They dominated. They played better than we did so they won the game -- but it looked worse than it really was."

After the goal line stand, Bishop's then pulled away in the fourth quarter, amassing 17 points en route to the win.

Offensively, Raven starting quarterback Sean O'Neill was only able to make one completion in 10 attempts, including one interception. He was replaced in the second quarter by backup Shawn Thompson, who was only somewhat better in amassing 104 yards on 10 completions in 21 attempts. He also threw four interceptions.

"We were unable to consistently make

Rugby team rolls along undefeated

by Matt Shurrle
Charlatan Staff

Two more games. Two more wins. And the rugby Ravens are on a roll.

On Sept. 29, the Ravens defeated the top-ranked Royal Military College Redmen 17-10 and then trounced the Trent Excalibur 26-3 on Oct. 2, to improve to 4-0.

Carleton 17 RMC 10 Carleton 26 Trent 3

This makes them the only remaining undefeated team in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's second rugby division.

"The skill level of the team has definitely improved over the past few weeks," said coach Lee Powell. "However, the players seem to be working individually, at times causing the progress of the team to be held back."

At halftime against the Redmen, the two teams were locked in a 3-3 tie. The Ravens then turned the tables on RMC with back-to-back tries by rookie outside centre Rick Haldane and kicker Mike Rys. Rys led the Ravens against the Redmen with a try, two converts and one penalty kick for 11 points.

The Redmen countered with a try of their own later in the second half to close the gap to 17-10, but then the Raven defence clamped down and took over.

With RMC driving down the field in the final minutes of the second half, the Ravens shut the Redmen out with excellent ball control and a concentration of tackles.

In Saturday's game against Trent, the Ravens again performed well defensively, holding the Excalibur to a meagre 3 points.

"The chemistry was a little off for most of the first half and we really didn't gel," said Haldane. "(But) in the second half, the team came together and played excellent-controlled ball."

Trent pressured Carleton early on, scoring first and threatening to score on two other occasions.

"It took us a while to get going," said inside centre Dave Howard. "This allowed them to really pressure our defence and in turn forced us to turn it up a notch in the second half."

Following the defence's lead, the offence began to click in the second half. Flanker Mike Row had a try for the Ravens, and Rys added another.

The victory allowed the Ravens to remain the only undefeated team in their division and let the coaching staff assess the club's play so far.

With three games remaining this season, Powell said he is pleased with the team's progress, but cautioned there still is room for improvement.

"The players need to perform as a team rather than as individuals. When the team works as individuals, they seem to take an extra two or three steps and get caught up field trying to make the big play."

Two injuries occurred in the rugby games this week. Mark Morrison left the match against RMC with an injury to his right leg. It's doubtful if he'll play in the Oct. 7 rematch against RMC in Kingston. Against Trent, Dave Howard suffered an injury to his neck, and he's doubtful for the rematch as well.

In other action, the Ravens' second team beat Trent's second team 56-0

Lesson learned

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

They are like children, these football Ravens -- fumbling, bumbling and stumbling along one moment, and then showing off confidence and poise in a comeback victory the next.

And this football season is, as much as anything, the story of their struggle to mature.

For them, this season is like a finishing school. Head coach Donn Smith is the teacher. They are the students. And each and every game provides them with a new lesson to be learned.

In their first game of the season against the McGill Redmen, they discovered the comeback. Trailing 17-3 at halftime, the Ravens rebounded in the fourth quarter to make a game of it before losing 22-17. But the lesson was understood. We can do it, they realized. We can be competitive.

So they went back to school and studied some more. And in their second game against the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees, they put into practice the lessons they had learned. Trailing 12-3 at the half, this time they rebounded to take an 18-12 lead -- their first of the year.

They must have been nervous then, those Ravens, and it showed. Because late in the fourth quarter, four Ravens misplayed a kickoff return and allowed Ottawa to recover a fumble. You could almost predict what was about to happen.

Sure enough, the Gee-Gees stormed back to tie the game at 18 apiece and then set up to kick a game-winning convert. The kick hit the uprights and bounced through into the end zone. But the referee didn't see it go through; the game remained tied. And the Ravens mastered another lesson -- opportunity.

Like little army ants, they marched down the field and won the game 19-18 on a single with 17 seconds left in the game.

It was their first win in two years. Lesson accomplished.

Moving on to their third game against last year's Vanier Cup champions, the Queen's Golden Gaels, the Ravens had another exercise in mind -- maintaining momentum. And even though they fell behind once again trailing 17-3 at halftime, they remembered the lesson, and a second-half offensive outburst propelled them to a 25-20 victory.

They must have been feeling cocky, those Ravens, after two straight come-from-behind wins like that. School's a breeze, they must have thought. What more do we need to learn?

A little humility perhaps. And that's exactly what they discovered as they were trounced 34-1 by the fourth-ranked Bishop's Gaiters in their latest game this past weekend. No miracle comeback. No win. Just the humble feeling that remains after you've been shellacked by a better team.

They're learning all right, the hard way.

And the lesson continues. □

Soccer men rebound after humbling tie

Seven goals in seven games for forward Basil Phillips after three against Ryerson

by Sarah Richards
Charlatan Staff

Call it a lesson well learned. After four straight victories to start their season, the Carleton men's soccer team was humbled with a 1-1 tie against the last-place Trent Excalibur on Sept. 29 in Ontario Universities Athletic Association's east division soccer action.

Carleton 1 Trent 1
Carleton 2 York 0
Carleton 5 Ryerson 2

The Ravens rebounded on the weekend with a 2-0 victory against the York Yeomen on Oct. 2 and a 5-2 thrashing of the Ryerson Rams on Oct. 3.

The Ravens are now ranked second in the country with a record of 6-0-1.

"Their egos were inflated and they thought they could go out and win without playing the system that (coach) Sandie (Mackie) has taught them," said assistant coach Hugh Campbell. "They wanted to play tippy-tappy football."

Several Raven players gave their own explanations behind the tie. Rookie forward Marty McCaffrey's agreed with Campbell.

"We were a little over-confident, because we heard they weren't a strong team, and they had given up a lot of goals. Before the game players were saying they would score certain goals."

But forward Basil Phillips partly disagreed with Campbell's explanation, saying that although the Ravens played poorly, they played a system nonetheless. The Ravens' strategy is to have the back four defencemen clear the ball up to their two forwards and have their four midfielders come up to provide offensive support.

"I think we played a system, but it works best against good teams. Teams that are scrappy and out of control like Trent -- it just doesn't work the same. Trent plays all over the place, and you get a lot of unexpected things happening."

The Trent goal came in the second half, when a scramble in front of the Ravens' net allowed the Excalibur to equalize forward John Lauro's first-half goal.

The one-all tie against Trent shocked many, including the Trent goalkeeper. Serge Desbiens said the Ravens were "very predictable."

He did, however, admit that Carleton was unlucky on several occasions. One such chance came from a goal by Phillips. Although the linesman did not raise the flag to indicate an offside player, the referee overruled the call and disallowed the goal.

"Maybe we needed that tie to get us back on track," said Raven sweeper Michael Zaborski. "For us, a tie is a loss."

But the Ravens won both their weekend games.

Four minutes into their Sunday match against Ryerson, the Rams were fetching the ball out of their net on a goal by defender David Rowntree. Phillips scored three goals and midfielder Chris Scuccato scored as well.

Ryerson scored on a penalty kick after Raven stopper Earl Cochrane fouled in the box setting up the penalty. Another goal in the second half rounded out the Rams' scoring.

The day before, the Ravens shut out the York offence to win 2-0. In his second game for the Ravens, composed rookie Marty McCaffrey scored when he chipped the ball over the York goalkeeper. Rowntree scored the second goal. □

Lacrosse club fights back for an overtime win

by Ryan Ward

They are not as bad as the Ottawa Senators.

The Carleton lacrosse club avoided total defeat this weekend, losing 11-5 to the first-placed Guelph Gryphons and rallying to an 8-6 overtime win against the McMaster Marauders.

The lacrosse club is now 1-3 on the season and tied for third with Brock University among five teams in the Ontario Universities Field Lacrosse Association League.

Guelph 11 Carleton 5
Carleton 8 McMaster 6

On Oct. 2 in Guelph, the team played the 3-0 Gryphons, fell behind early and never caught up. They trailed 10-2 at the half.

"When we played against Guelph, we were very unorganized. We fell behind in the score," said rookie attack Shawn Murphy. "At least we got Guelph out of the way so we can concentrate on beating the other teams."

The lacrosse club has been unorganized in recent games because they've been playing without their coach Glen Harrison, who has been busy organizing the Canadian national lacrosse championships.

"I've been organizing the championships for some time and at least I will be returning for the team's next game," said Harrison.

Playing without coach Harrison has definitely hurt the Carleton team. Without the stability, leadership and coaching he provides, too many players have been playing selfishly and without a team focus.

"Many guys want to do their own thing and without a coach, it's hard to play as a team," said lacrosse attack Jason Tasse.

As a result, Carleton lost to Guelph. Tasse led the club with two goals. Attacks Dan McWhirter, Steve Simenovic and Scott Cavin each added singles.

Following that loss, the 0-3 lacrosse club faced off against the 0-3 McMaster Marauders in a basement battle to escape last place.

At the half, Carleton clung to a 5-3 lead, but McMaster stormed back in the second half, scoring three straight goals and taking a 6-5 lead.

"We thought we were down but we weren't out and we fought for the win," said Tasse.

With 30 seconds remaining in the game, McWhirter netted his first of the game to tie the contest at six.

In overtime, Shawn Murphy netted the winner and an insurance marker completing a hat trick and giving Carleton the 8-6 win.

"Our team was passing the ball around and I saw an opening so I took it," said Murphy. "We will be a force to be reckoned with if we play like we did Sunday. There is still a long way to go and we could come out ahead in the end."

Murphy led the club with three goals, Tasse scored twice and singles went to midfielder Pat Murawski and attack Shawn Gilmour.

The club's next game is Oct. 16 at McMaster and Oct. 17 at Brock University. □

Raven Rumbblings

QUOTE OF THE WEEK

"For us, a tie is a loss."
Raven sweeper Michael Zaborski on the humbling 1-1 tie the men's soccer team split with the Trent Excalibur. At the time, the 4-0 Ravens were ranked second in the country while the 1-3 Excalibur were sitting second-last in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's east division.

BRIEFS

The Carleton hockey club lost 4-3 to the Royal Military College Redmen in exhibition play on Oct. 3 at the R.A. Centre.

Scoring for the hockey club were forward Rob Carleton, forward Adam McGuire and defenceman Ken Pagan.

CORRECTION

We goofed. Our apologies to women's soccer defender Christine Archambault, whose name we misspelled for two weeks straight. Archibald was wrong. Archibault was right. But from here on -- Archambault will be right.

Field hockey drops another pair

Frustration mounts as losses pile up

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

The losses just keep piling up and the frustration just keeps growing for the Carleton women's field hockey team.

At Minto Field last weekend, the Ravens lost 1-0 to the Queen's Golden Gaels on Oct. 1 and then went down to defeat 2-1 against the McGill Redmen on Oct. 3 at Lansdowne Park.

Queen's 1 Carleton 0
McGill 2 Carleton 1

The losses drop the Ravens' record to 1-6-2 midway through the season and leaves them in eighth place among nine teams in the Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletic Association's field hockey league.

But despite the losses, there's another more serious and underlying problem threatening the Ravens field hockey team -- a lack of intensity.

"I was thinking it was just going to be a matter of time before they scored," said coach Suzanne Nicholson, referring to the Gael's offensive spark in the first game. "We just didn't seem to want to win as much as Queen's did. They (the Ravens) have to decide they want to beat these teams. It looked like they almost stopped trying. To me it was just a matter of time before one (Queen's shot) went into the net."

And so one did.

Early in the second half, a Queen's shot deflected off Raven link Vicki Wilcox into the Carleton net.

"It was a shot our goalie wasn't ready for," said Raven forward Krista Wilson. "One of our players tried to get to it and it changed directions and deflected off her so that our goalie couldn't react."

Trailing 1-0, the Ravens had the opportunity to mount a comeback but the desire to win wasn't there.

"There was so much time left," said a frustrated Wilson. "But people have to want to win. It was just the beginning of the second half and people were giving up already. You can't stop playing until the second half is over."

The intensity was gone. And unfortunately, the same scenario eventually played itself out in the McGill game.

Carleton opened the scoring on a beautiful breakaway goal by midfielder Suzanne Bird 10 minutes into the game.

"She was on a break, and as she got close to the goalie, the goalie knocked her feet out from under her," said Wilson. "But the ball was still loose and as she was down on the ground she reached over and swept it in."

And so it was. The only problem was that McGill twisted Carleton's momentum-swinging goal into a challenge for themselves. And just two minutes later, the game was tied.

"With McGill, our goal gave them the strength to come back and score," said Nicholson, commenting on the Redmen's quick equalizer.

McGill scored again in the second half and the Ravens lost heart.

"We get down one goal and almost assume we've lost even though there's a whole half to go," said Nicholson.

Players agree there's an intensity problem, but the agreement stops there.

"It's a mental thing," said Wilson, who won a silver medal with the Ontario field hockey team at the Canada Games this summer. "There's not much of a difference between us and these other teams. It's not a talent thing, it's more of a mental thing. Sometimes it takes a while to learn how to win."

Not so, says Nicholson. She says the veterans need to show more leadership.

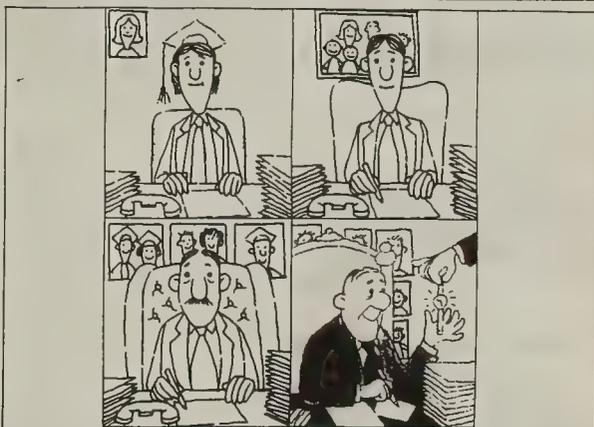

"They're very good players but I could be getting a lot more out of them," she said, referring to her upper-year players. "The rookies have been doing all I can expect of them, but I need more effort out of some of the stronger veteran players. They're certainly good players but I know they have more to offer."

Defender Suzanne Lachapelle sees it differently.

"Maybe some people are more competitive than others," she said. "And it's hard to bring all of us together on the same intensity level because we're all so different."

The Ravens will attempt to regroup Oct. 8 at Minto Field with a rematch against the Redmen at 3 p.m. □

Rowing club strokes to improvement

by Alec Maclaren
Charlatan Staff

There were signs of life on the Trent River Oct. 2.

At the Head of the Trent regatta involving universities and clubs from across southern Ontario, the Carleton rowing club improved on the results from its last regatta in Ottawa.

Rowers Trevor MacKey and Rob Bennett dominated both the individual and double lightweight competitions.

"They smoked everybody -- Ottawa U, Queen's, Toronto and Western," said rower and club president Dave Lewis. MacKey and Bennett won the men's lightweight double in a time of 19:47 over the 4.5 kilometre course. In the single lightweight sculls, MacKey took top honors while Bennett finished in third.

The varsity men's coxed four came in third out of five boats. Their time of 18:23 was just 28 seconds behind the winner, Queen's.

The varsity men's eight finished in sixth and last place by eight seconds.

The Ravens' rowing results after two regattas are an improvement over previous years.

"It's because we have more boats in the events," said Lewis. "A lot of returning athletes have come back to build the program and help the sport at Carleton University."

Lewis says much of this improvement can be attributed to a maturation of the Carleton rowing club itself. While much of the management has been in place for a few years, experienced coaches, such as ex-Olympian John Ossowski, are helping out the program.

Furthermore, there's a large number of both novice and experienced rowers in Raven colors this year. □

The varsity men's eight finished last among six crews at the Head of the Trent regatta in Peterborough this past weekend.

Swim team gets wet behind the ears

by Mark Colgrave
Charlatan Staff

The Carleton Ravens swim team, along with the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees and the Queen's Golden Gaels, participated in a pre-season swim meet Oct. 2 in Montpetit Hall at Ottawa University.

It may not have been the Olympics, but this small swim meet suited the men's and women's swim teams just fine. The loosely run relay tournament almost looked like a friendly game of pool tag. There was no point system and no times were recorded.

"We didn't care if we won or lost," said women's swim coach Jitka Kotler. "We have a lot of first-year swimmers, and we needed to introduce them to swim meets at the university level. It was a lot of fun, and we believe we're off to a good start for the upcoming year."

A highlight of the meet was the men's 4 X 100-metre relay. The Carleton squad came from behind to take the race in the last 200 metres -- something that didn't escape the watchful eyes of the men's coach Brian Johnson.

"It was the last event of the day and we wanted to leave with a win," he said. "So we put in a couple of young guys and a couple of big guys and they won it in the end."

Most of the time an athletic competition is judged on concrete results. Simply put, wins and losses. But this swim meet could be evaluated on a different level. The coaches can now address the strengths and weaknesses in their teams and build a strong swimming unit. □

Waterpolo men surprised in season-opening loss

by Richard G.D. Scott
Charlatan Staff

In sports, frustration is an uncontrollable emotion that usually has a tendency to explode.

For the men's waterpolo team, that frustration was being down a man in the final quarter, which led to a season-opening loss to the Queen's Golden Gaels on Oct. 3.

Queen's 11 Carleton 5

After defeating Queen's twice last year, the Ravens strode into the game with plenty of confidence. After a quick score, it appeared the Ravens would have little trouble with the Gaels.

Over-confidence, though, quickly led to mistakes and lackadaisical play. At halftime, the Ravens trailed 5-3.

"There was a lot of good work, but there were basic things that were not being done," said head coach John Pankiw. "We needed better execution with the extra man as well as better checking and one-on-one play on defence."

In the second half, the Ravens kept themselves within two goals of Queen's. A couple of posts, though, and some hot Queen's goaltending by Mark Bason, prevented the Ravens from tying the game.

Then, early in the final quarter, the Ravens' top offensive threat, driver Dave Bason, reacted to a cheap foul from a Gaels defender and the referee whistled in a controversial brutality call to the cries of the opposition's bench.

"Dave lost his temper and we were down one man from there," said captain/goaltender Allemander Pereira.

Bason was ejected from the game and will also miss the Ravens' next match.

From there, things fell apart and the Gaels pulled ahead for an 11-5 victory.

"Frustration led to the Dave Bason brutality call," said Pankiw after the game. "It's tough to come back when you're a man down and you've lost your top scorer."

Oooh, that sinking feeling.

Coming off their best season in years, the defending bronze medal champions will be looking for little less than last year's prize. Even with a turnover of three of the team's starting veterans, Pankiw and his players believe they have the talent to return to the final four playoff round to be held at McMaster University this November.

"The game was really frustrating because we knew we were a better team man for man," said fourth-year veteran Jeff McGrath.

The Ravens' discipline this year will have to come from team play. Although a lot of individual talent graduated from last year, there are underlying stars such as the sophomore Bason and ex-Brazilian National team member Pereira.

"Maybe it was good we lost game one," said McGrath. "Now we'll know to work hard for our victories and nothing will be taken for granted. It kind of acted as a reality check."

The Ravens' next game is Oct. 7 against the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees: the Seal Game, which is waterpolo's equivalent to football's Panda Game rivalry. Carleton won the Seal Game for the first time in seven years last season and are favored again this year. The Gee-Gees have few experienced players this season and could prove weak in net after a season opening 10-3 loss to Queen's. □

Two road victories vault soccer women into second

Raven offence discovers scoring finesse

by Bram S. Aaron
Charlatan Staff

The Carleton Ravens women's soccer team picked up three points on a road trip to Toronto this past weekend, improving their record to 3-2-1 and moving into second place in the Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletics Association east division soccer league. After tying the undefeated York Yeowomen 1-1 on Oct. 2, Carleton shut out the Ryerson Lady Rams 3-0 on Oct. 3.

Carleton 7 Trent 1
Carleton 1 York 1
Carleton 3 Ryerson 0

In earlier OWIAA action last week, the Ravens hammered the Trent Excalibur 7-1 on Sept. 29 at home.

The Trent game marked the first appearance of coach David Kent's new 4-3-3 field alignment. The previous 5-3-2 alignment featured five defenders, three midfielders, and two forwards. The new arrangement has three forwards and only four fullbacks.

"It's giving us more offensive opportunities (to score) up the middle," said co-captain Mary McCormick. "We're improved as a team. I'm pretty happy with the way we played."

It must have worked. The Ravens exploded for a season high of seven goals against Trent. Previously, Carleton had only scored one goal in three games.

Against York, the Ravens played most of the game one player short. Within the first 10 minutes of the game, sweeper Anne-Marie Irwin received a red-card ejection for an alleged handball in the goalie's 18-yard box. The resulting penalty shot netted York's only goal.

"The team was shocked at the red card," said Kent. "But each of them reached back for something inside and they played a hundred per cent better."

Carleton trailed the game until the 75th minute, when Nancy Sheppard scored to gain the tie.

"It's the best game we've played against York in years," said Kent.

Finally, in their last match of the weekend, the Ravens defeated a Ryerson squad slightly improved over past years.

"They're one of the better Ryerson teams I've seen," said defender Christine Archambault. "Usually we defeat them quite handily."

Last year, Carleton defeated Ryerson 5-1 and 3-0 in two regular season matches.

The Ravens resume action Oct. 7 with an away game in Kingston against the Queen's Golden Gaels. □

Does gold lie at the end of the waterpolo pool?

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

University of Toronto Varsity Blues

LAST YEAR: Finished first in the league with McMaster. Defeated Carleton in semi-final action before losing the gold medal game to McMaster.

STRENGTHS: The "ocean" and experience. The Blues practise in the league's largest pool - a 20 by 30 metre pool as opposed to the smaller 15 by 22 metre ones most other schools use -- and they're a stronger swimming team as a result. The Blues are led by the experienced core of driver Brian Turner, who has a cannon for an arm and holeman John Szabo.

WEAKNESSES: Bench strength. Take away the Blues' starting lineup and holes exist because they have no quality reserves to fill their places.

McMaster Marauders

LAST YEAR: Finished tied for first with Toronto during the regular season but placed second on tie-breaking rules. Defeated the Western Mustangs in semi-final action before winning the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's championship game against Toronto.

STRENGTHS: Training and confidence. Most team members are used to training 10 months a year in the Hamilton aquatic club waterpolo system, as opposed to two months like most other league teams. Confidence is another strong suit. In the last 10 years, the Marauders have only lost two championships.

WEAKNESSES: None. If you really want to beat McMaster, you need two things: luck and more luck. This team has no real weakness so to win, you just have to catch them on an off day.

University of Western Mustangs

LAST YEAR: Finished third in the OUAA men's waterpolo league. Lost to the McMaster Marauders in semi-final playoff action and then lost the bronze medal final to Carleton.

STRENGTHS: Fitness. Western is a well-skilled and strong swimming team -- and that makes it difficult for opponents to exploit a weakness.

WEAKNESSES: Leadership and coaching. On this team, nobody stands out. Two veterans, drivers Rob McCloud and Doug Klein lead the team, but neither is a dominant superstar who can single-handedly win a game. Coaching continuity is also a problem. The Mustangs have had three different coaches in each of the past three seasons.

Carleton Ravens

LAST YEAR: Fourth in regular season play with a 6-5-1 record. Lost to the University of Toronto Varsity Blues in semi-final action. Defeated the Western Mustangs for the bronze medal -- their first top-three finish in eight years.

STRENGTHS: Bench strength and lefties. The Ravens lost three starters to graduation last year and they can still field a competitive team. Left-handers are a rarity in the league but Carleton boasts two in drivers Dave Bason and Dave Creaghan. They bring a unique scoring punch to the Carleton side.

WEAKNESSES: Depth and swimming. Last year's bench is now the starting lineup. That leaves the reserve core inexperienced.

Queen's Golden Gaels

LAST YEAR: Fifth in the league.

STRENGTHS: Goaltender Mark Bason and holechecker Mike Greenwood were both members of the junior men's national waterpolo team. They provide leadership to a young, mostly second-year team.

WEAKNESSES: Inexperience. After Bason and Greenwood, the talent level drops. It might take the Golden Gaels a full season to develop their younger and less talented players.

University of Ottawa Gee-Gees

LAST YEAR: Sixth in the league behind Queen's University.

STRENGTHS: Coaching and speed. Ottawa coach Jim O'Malley was a member of the national team and a well-respected coach. He will be counting on fourth-year driver Matthieu Lebreque to lead the team along with converted speed swimmer Matt de Vleiger, who was a force in last year's juvenile championships.

WEAKNESSES: Inexperience and strategy. Despite having a top-notch coach, the Gee-Gees don't have the skill to execute smart, strategic waterpolo.

York Yeomen

LAST YEAR: Seventh and last in the OUAA.

STRENGTHS: None. Okay, maybe that's a little too harsh. The Yeomen are coached by junior national team waterpolo coach Ross McDonald and they have recruited left-handed Dennis Milenov to lead, but after that?

WEAKNESSES: Everything. There's a reason why York has finished last in the OUAA for the past two years. The team has no outstanding players, they train in a small pool which impedes their swimming ability and they're the punching bag for the rest of the division. □

Tibetan monks share spirituality

Monks of Ganden Jangtse
Benefit Concert for Tibetan Refugees
Canadian Museum of Civilization
Sept. 29

This group of 10 monks from the Ganden Jangtse Monastery in India is touring around the world to raise awareness about the political situation in Tibet and raise money for its monastery in exile in South India, which is home to more than 800 monks and receives between 70 to 90 refugees from Tibet each year.

The original Ganden Monastery was founded in 1409 in Tibet. It was the first and regarded as one of the most important monasteries in the Gelugpa tradition of Tibetan Buddhism. It was demolished in 1959, when the Chinese invaded Tibet.

I have to admit, during most of the performance I did not connect with what the monks were doing on stage. I was lost and my mind was wandering.

There were a couple of reasons for this. First, there's my ignorance of Tibetan Buddhist philosophy and how it was symbolically represented in the rituals performed.

Second, I was distracted by the worry of making any association with my own Chinese culture. That would have been no big deal, save for the current unfavorable political situation between the two people, or to put it more bluntly, the oppression of the Tibetans by the Chinese state.

And seeing how I'd already once of-Raffi, kids and the environment

by Drew Edwards
Charlatan Staff

Baby beluga in the deep blue sea, you swim so wild and you swim so free . . .

In the early part of 1990 renowned children's musician Raffi announced he was no longer going to perform for kids. He was going to become a "serious" musician, doing songs with an environmental message. Raffi was giving up the kids to become a tree hugger. Everyone thought he had lost his marbles.

Heaven above and the sea below and the little white whale on the go.

He was not very successful. 1990's Evergreen Everblue sold only 150,000 copies. Raffi went for radio airplay, Raffi made videos and as he says, "the cross over into other mediums didn't work too well." Hugging trees, it would seem, is not a career enhancing experience if you're a kids' musician.

Baby beluga, baby beluga, is the water warm, is your mama home with you so happy.

So now he's back with the kids. He's just released his 11th album, a live offering called Raffi on Broadway. It contains all the old favorites like "Brush Your Teeth" and "Baby Beluga" as well as new stuff that is more environmental in its message.

And Raffi, though his last album didn't set sales records, is a definite success as an environmentalist. He received the fended a Tibetan with a natural, albeit naive, association between the two cultures (doing something so simple as asking her if she spoke Chinese), I did not want to do it again via this mass medium.

However, after unpacking all that, the show was enlightening.

Before the backdrop of a giant tapestry of the Potala Palace in Tibet, and with the presence of the Dalai Lama in a black-and-white portrait, the Ganden (symbol of compassion), cymbals and drums.

The chanters welcomed the spirit of the Dalai Lama and asked the Buddhas and Bodhisattvas (gods) to bless and protect the rituals. Five dakinis, goddesses of five wisdoms, entered onto the stage. They invited the Buddhas to the Pure Land. The monks chanted and offered the universe to the dakinis, so in return the Wise Ones, or Buddhas, would be allowed to stay in the world. The dakinis drums.

The chanters showed their aspiration and commitment to realizing the essence of Buddha-dharma (the spiritual path) through the Lama, by offering all good things, including their mind, their speech and body. The universe is purified through prayer and meditation. The monks asked Karma Yama, a wrathful protector, to dispel all negative energies and protect their good intentions.

More deep, hypnotic chanting. The monks moved off and on stage with a natural gracefulness and ease, as if the stage had been transformed into their monastery.

The second part was less solemn, more festive, with dancers in elaborate costumes, a dramatic sketch, and ended with a prayer for peace.

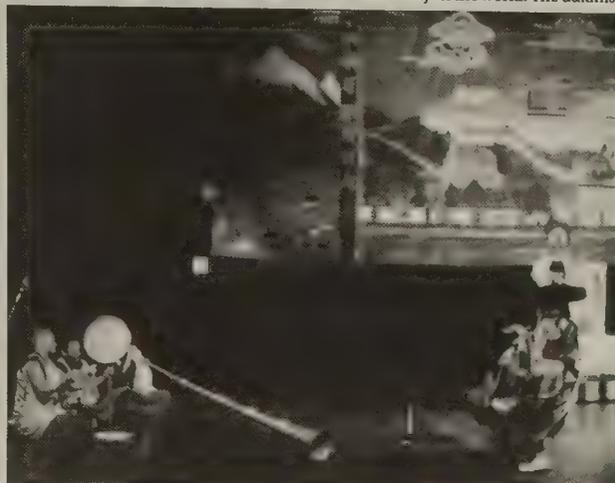

The dances included: Durdu Dakpo (dance of death), where the Enlightened Ones appeared as two skeleton lords, to help realize the truth of impermanence and destroy worldly attachment; the Shanag Garcham (Black Hat Dance) and Palden Lhamo (so Khorsoom (Palden Lhamo and her two disciples) celebrated other aspects of Tibetan history/mythology.

With offerings of incense and rice, music and song, the Ganden Jangtse monks concluded their performance with "Victory of Goodness and Enlightenment," praying for the success of all spiritual practice and the happiness of all sentient beings.

My favorite moment of the evening was after the show when the house lights came on. The audience continued to clap.

Finally the monks reappeared on stage. As they stood at the back of the stage with great humility, they smiled at the audience, held out their hands, bowed repeatedly and waved. It seemed they were saying: Thank you for letting us show you a bit of our lives, even though you may not understand all of it, we who are from such a distant place.

That was when I finally connected. □

Is that the Dalai Lama or Dizzy Gillespie? Who can tell?

Jangtse monks chanted.

A hypnotic continuous chant. The monks stood on stage, sometimes sitting, at times accompanied by instruments: the Dungchen, a long trumpet; the Drilbu, a bell (symbol of wisdom); the Dorje agreed.

The music was rhythmic but unmelodic, usually constituting only two or three notes. Up and down, up and down, accompanied by the unrhythmic clashing of cymbals and knocking of United Nations' Environmental Achievement Award in 1992 and attended the Earth Summit in Rio last year.

Way down yonder where the dolphins play, where you dive and splash all day. The waves roll in and the waves roll out, see the water squirting out of your spout.

Raffi's message in his concerts is simple: "Why we love the earth and how we can preserve it," he says. But to university students his message is a little less festive.

"Students should ask why there is so much denial about the environment," he says. "There is a federal election less than a year after the conference in Rio, yet nobody is saying anything about the environment."

Baby beluga, baby beluga, sing your little song, we like to hear you.

Raffi left children's music to educate himself and others.

"The baby beluga whales that I sang about are now an endangered species. When they die the toxins in their body are at the level of a toxic waste site," he says. "I couldn't know about things like that and not do something about it."

And so he did.

Baby beluga in the deep blue sea, swim so wild and you swim so free . . .

When examined from that perspective, Raffi's tree-hugging no longer seems so strange. While it may have not garnered him the Muchmusic audience he was looking for, he made a good personal decision to do something about an issue which troubled him. That's further than most of us get.

In the long run, passing on an environmental message to a young audience may do more for his earthy cause than anything else he could possibly do. □

Sugar and spice and everything soca

by Sean Silcoff
Charlatan Staff

Spice and Co. with Outcry
Creeque Alley
Oct. 1

Spice and Co. came to Creeque Alley last week to show Ottawa that the latest Caribbean export is a little soca with a lot of sugar.

The soca-dancehall band from Barbados played their infectious tunes (a new hybrid of familiar Caribbean styles) to an appreciative crowd, but underneath the hip-shaking groove was a slick, sugar-coated stage show that could have passed as standard wedding or bar mitzvah fare.

It didn't help that lead singer Alan Sheppard, a dead ringer for Billy Ray Cyrus, delivered his songs in a trite, affected manner. His over-the-top emotional rendition of "Bob's Song," a ballad dedicated to a certain dead Jamaican superstar, came complete with clenched fists and unconvincing contemplative upward glances, while the dancier numbers were recited as if by rote.

The band was hampered by shallow, cliché-ridden song titles, like "It's Just an Irie Feeling," "Rastaman" and "Island Woman," and dumb lyrics ("Cause the only gun I got/Is the gun inside me pants").

The music also had a commercial air to it, slick in packaging and professional in execution.

But since this is feel-good dance music, it's doubtful that such things as lyrics, song titles and presentation really matter. What's more important was the band's ability to get everybody on their feet and keep them there.

In that regard, Spice and Co. delivered big time.

Within 90 seconds of hitting the stage, the band had packed the dance floor. By the end of the first song, Sheppard received hearty confirmation from all at Creeque Alley that everyone wanted to "party tonight."

Sheppard maintained a good rapport with the crowd, prompting them to wave their hands, sing along and keep up the good spirits. The snaky tempo of the soca-dancehall beat ensured that legs, hips and heads were in constant motion, even at the back of the club.

So what if the show seemed more like a West Indies revue, a Star Search version of a Caribbean band? So what if you expected a conga-line of suited fifty-something family-of-the-bride members to come crashing through the door at any minute?

Spice and Co. were more concerned with inflicting a good time on everybody than squeezing musical excellence out of their thin material.

The package may have been glossy and trite, but everyone seemed to have a good time.

Local reggae outfit Outcry opened the show, showing the promise of a band with better days ahead. This young band (all but one of its members are still in high school) played mostly originals, demonstrating a good ear for melodic roots-reggae stylings.

The band's songs, which frequently mentioned conflicts in Central America and the former Yugoslavia, may have seemed like pretentious politicking on the part of these teenagers.

But the group is seasoned by its international diversity. Most of the players are from outside Canada, including a Bosnian drummer and a Trinidadian lead singer. This lent a certain credence to their calls to "Raise your fist in the air for the victims in Bosnia/Guatemala/South Africa."

The band also covered familiar reggae territory, managing to shoehorn the words "Babylonians," "exploitation" and "soldier man" into one song.

The band's smooth tempo and melodic ear made up for a complete lack of stage presence. Each band member was so preoccupied with his instrument that the group seemed to forget it was performing in front of other people.

Outcry received a polite reception from the crowd. One can expect them to receive more attention in the future. □

The skinny tie that binds

by Ian McLeod
Charlatan Staff

Donald Trump announces his new and grandiose business plans. A television mail-order music collection offers hits by — among others — A-ha, the Bangles, and the Pet Shop Boys. A major magazine proclaims that legwarmers are the height of fashion.

Is it 1983 or 1993? Believe it or not, the time is now, and the eighties are back in style.

It all started to dawn on me the other day. I was sitting at home, watching TV, when all of a sudden, a certain ad came on. Some generic dude, sitting in comfy Scandinavian splendor, offers this soft pitch for a CD collection featuring the greatest hits of the 1980s.

Clips from various, basically interchangeable eighties' bands followed, filling my living room with the sounds I sometimes confess to having grown up on (I found myself humming "Walk Like An Egyptian" for the next three days). Yes, Totally '80s can be yours now — in case, God forbid, you've thrown this stuff out in the past three years.

This appalling lapse in taste started me thinking — what if the eighties make a comeback? Then I remembered things that I had seen or heard, but which my mind hadn't fully registered: "The Donald" announcing his attempt at a comeback, now that he's out of the multi-million-dollar hole he had dug himself into during the eighties, Duran Duran's spectacular comeback earlier this year, all those rollerbladers out on the streets (remember the roller disco craze of 1980-81? Ugh.) and the like.

FASHION

I voiced my concerns about this to Charlatan editor-in-chief "The Mo" Gannon and she noted that Sassy magazine had announced that legwarmers were coming back into style. I mentioned this as a possible story idea to the arts editor, and when I responded to his subsequent phone message, he was listening to the Pet Shop Boys! More evidence in my favor, thought I.

So, it's pretty well official. The eighties are staging a revival. Never mind that the decade's barely over to begin with — three years seems to be enough time to regurgitate that fateful decade back into mass culture.

This is not a good thing. I was really starting to enjoy the seventies' revival — you know, disco, bell bottoms, platform shoes and pot. Now comes the time in which we are supposed to celebrate Europop, shoulder pads, skinny New Wave ties, and Perrier? I don't think so.

My friends do, though. Mere moments into my tirade about the "greed decade" coming back, I was interrupted mid-sentence by two of them launching into an appreciation of the "really great" clothes that we wore in the eighties: Peter Pan booties, designer jeans, and rigger pants, to name but a few. I protested, complaining about the whole lack of ethics and morality in the eighties, summarized in the movie Wall Street as "greed is good."

Not to mention the music, I proclaimed. This started them off on the "cool" music that we listened to back then and how much fun it would be to have Totally '80s for parties. Then another realization struck me — these people are part of the same group of my friends who want to start an eighties' band called the Blue Cheese Generation, intending to perform both covers and original works.

Worse yet, I remember supporting this idea.

I AM AN EIGHTIES TRAITOR!!!

All right, perhaps I should rethink this. The eighties may not have been as bad as I've been portraying them. A lot of the music has held up nicely. Duran Duran's closet fans came out of hiding to help make their comeback a success, David Bowie's Let's Dance is one of my favorite albums of all time, and the Smiths' "How Soon Is Now?" is being used to sell "eis-bier."

I would also like to admit to a secret fetish for Bananarama's cover of "Venus," and to a not-so-secret one for the Cure.

Some of the clothes weren't too bad either: patterned sweaters, leather bomber jackets and the Gap were all very stylish products of the eighties (and sexist though it may be to admit, I think women look very nice in miniskirts). Okay, so "greed is good" is a terrible philosophy, but so was "Burn, baby, burn!"

And maybe every woman I know is gagging with a spoon at the thought of ever wearing legwarmers again except in direst times of freezing cold. There must be someone out there who will embrace them. Everything old is new again. It's just a matter of time.

What was the number for Totally '80s again? Never mind, I'll find out — it's all a matter of networking. □

Cracker
Kerosene Hat
Virgin

Excuse me if I sound like I'm going overboard in my praise of this, Cracker's second CD. I've had this album for several weeks and I've been listening to it non-stop.

Cracker captures the essence of American rock and they make it sound good. They've got the authenticity that pretenders like the Spin Doctors only dream about and people like Bruce Springsteen used to have. Plus, unlike these fellows, they have a wicked sense of humor.

They also sing country better than anyone else around. Take the country track, "Lonesome Johnny Blues." I love it. Me, who hates all country except for Johnny Cash.

And "Loser," a Grateful Dead cover. I can't stand the Grateful Dead and I'm completely sucked into the morose angst of this tale.

Then there's "Low," "Movie Star," "Sweet Potato" and "Let's Go For a Ride." Pardon the expression, but this is hard rockin' feel-good music for when you're driving the pickup truck.

And the lyrics. They're alternately witty, absurd and sometimes downright poetic, with flashes of true brilliance. Nowhere else will you hear the lines, "The chief of police kept the crime off the streets/Deep in his heart, we all knew he felt differently/We all knew he was an anarchist." It's music you can just spit out as you're driving too fast down the highway.

There's more, including some hidden tracks, but I don't want to ruin all your fun.

Even though there's still a couple of months to go, this album has my vote for release of the year.

Dinner is Ruined
Songs from the Lubritorium Rang Energy

Lubritorium: the 1950s equivalent of an automobile oil change facility.

If you think the title is weird, you should hear the music. This Toronto-based band's debut CD isn't comparable to anything I've ever heard before. There's no three-chord wonders on this one, folks. A little beyond alternative, it's pretty much unorthodox.

Aside from the traditional distorted guitar, bass and drums, there are traces of banjo, mandolin, rainstick, recorder, cello, violin, a cheesy organ, tuba, trumpet and trombone.

While the instrumentation sounds a bit folkish, the music is anything but. It is disturbingly dissonant and sometimes lacks a lot normal things — a well-defined key, for example.

Lyrical content is good. You've got to admire any band who can sing about the Heritage Front and Harry the Burger Man (a guy obsessed with dead meat) on the same CD. Unfortunately, it's hard to appreciate the lyrical depth unless you actually read the lyrics on the liner notes — singer Dale Morningstar's vocals are completely unintelligible.

While this release scores big points on originality, it's not for everyone. Beware unless you're into left-wing alternative or experimental music.

Definition FX
Light Speed Collision
RCA

You can't label Definition FX. Fusing together elements of jazz-metal-dance-pop-trash and techno on this, their first album, they have produced a fresh, innovative sound.

Formed in 1990 in Sydney, Australia, Definition FX quickly found themselves in the spotlight. After being together for only three months, they became finalists in a major band competition and ended up performing two songs (they knew only four at the time) on national television.

A collage of sound is the only way to describe Definition FX. Jazz, metal and pop riffs are thrown on top of a techno beat with splashes of dance and trash. The end result: songs that sound hypnotic, and then, a few bars later, are spurring with uncontrolled fury.

Notable tracks include "This Is The Place," "Something Inside (No Time For Nowhere)" and "Crystalise."

If you want something fresh and original, this is the album for you.

Ren & Stimpy
You Eediot!
Crock O' Christmas
Nickelodeon

You like the old Ren & Stimpy standards — the opening and closing music, "Happy, Happy, Joy, Joy," the "Log Theme," the "Muddy Mudskipper Theme," "Don't Whiz on the Electric Fence," — you buy You Eediot!

All the music and most of the running jokes are there, with one unforgivable exception: nary a mention of Powdered Toast Man.

Several tracks, like "Firedogs," "Space Madness" and "Sven's Theme" are nothing more than culled sound material from the show, set to simplistic R & B riffs. If you have a CD player, program it to avoid these tracks — they really blow. "Nose Goblins," however, with its subtle wit, kicks ass.

You like to hear new material, you buy Crock O' Christmas.

It also has the same running jokes — body hair, fecal matter (both solid and gaseous), shaven yaks flying in enchanted canoes through the winter sky, stay-put socks, meat by-products, circus-midget-beating firemen, and everyone's favorite holiday highlight, old drunken burns — put to those annoyingly saccharine Christmas carols. Ren singing "I Hate Christmas" is the album's sole saving grace.

But hurry, only 30 shopping days left before these fine products become "that's so 10-minutes-ago."

David Bartolf

Iggy Pop
American Caesar
Virgin

He's back. Back from the edge of the abyss, going back over the edge, kicking the abyss's ass, and making it back more zombie'd than alive.

Punkdom's favorite bag of bile and sinew, still looking like a wiry, mummified Jeremy Irons, has put out an Iggy Pop album as it should be: meandering, belligerent, malevolent, and totally lacking in synthesizers and bullshit.

Dangerous as ever, Ig can still half-croon, half-yell the most malicious lyrics you'll ever hear. He opens with "Character," a growling lament for the lost attribute of moxie in today's world: "One good thing at least about some/Of these junkies was/They had some character... At least when they played/

The damn guitar they'd play it/Like they meant it. These white bread boys nowadays/Knowin' all the score/Don't even know how to puke."

On "Plastic and Concrete" he husks, "I'm a nightmare child/Stuck on my own knife/I'm glad my mother loved me/I'm sick and paranoid."

With "Fuckin' Alone," Ig has put out the strongest song about feeling alienated and disconnected I have heard in years; listening to it I kept on saying, "Damn straight," to myself. It's so true. It has replaced John Cale's "Fear" as my favorite song of loathing.

Rollins fans be warned. Here's the extent of his contribution to the album: two "yeahs" and a knee-jerk, jingoistic phrase "I'd just like to say at this point that I'm a 24-hour, 7-days-a-week, 365-day-a-year American."

For those wanting a reprise of "Wild Child," there's "Boogie Boy" and "Wild America."

The last two tracks are killers. Iggy does a wicked cover of the tune "Louie Louie" and winds the record down with an epic, rambling, decadent role-playing of Nero in "Caesar."

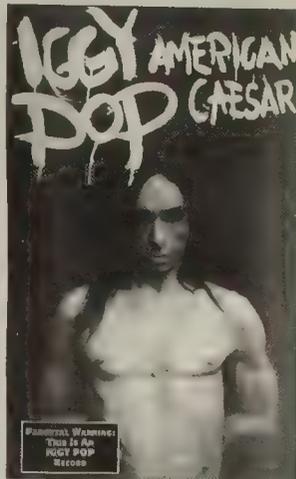

David Bartolf

The Rhinos
Fishing In The Fountain of Youth
Sonihr

The Rhinos possess talent but don't use it.

They've got a whisper of UB40 in their sound in songs like "Celebrate Life" and "Slow Easy Groove." These songs are among the few decent tracks on this album.

The humorous "Dancing With My Dog" and the very guitar-based "Psychedelic Billy and the Zanies" and "Crazy Little World" are also worth listening to.

The rest of the songs are either downright boring or are ruined by the imitative vocals of Danny Michel and Mike Blanchard — at points, they come across like they're trying to imitate Bono.

The band is made up of five members who use several guests on the album, including vocalist Errol Blackwood who guests on the song "Celebrate Life." Funny that it is one of the better songs on the tape. Hmmm...

It's too bad that they don't really sound as melodious as other great Canadian artists, but they do have potential. Their unused talent could create miracles if it was to ever erupt.

Ali Jafri

Twilight Rituals
Nazca Runway
EMI

This album starts off with "The Top," a mélange of deep vocals, heavy guitars, mellow humming and pop-like mid-range vocals. Forget the mellow fade out that most songs end with. This has a powerful, poignant, killer ending. POW. You'll never see it coming... at least the first few times. But then you'll start paying attention, learning the lyrics and when you get that last note right on... boy, does it feel good.

The Rituals, with great spirit, are able to successfully meld many musical elements together. These songs seem influenced by the likes of 13 Engines mixed with a jazz feel. From beginning to end, the more I listen to this album the more I enjoy it.

Twilight Rituals, based out of Toronto, have produced some singles in the past as well as an independent release, but this is their full-fledged debut on a major label. For me, eight songs are not enough. These guys are going to be around for a while.

Muchmusic Mayhem!

by Jane Tattersall
Charlatan Staff

haos. That was the first word to enter my mind as I entered the Muchmusic studios for the 1993 video awards on Sept. 30. I had expected the awards to be in some sort of "show" format, as most awards shows are.

Leave it up to the people at Muchmusic, however, to run the show as an open concept and throw everybody in the studio together, with little indication of what was going on.

Sure we got a list of what awards were being presented and when, but who could find the "Much Area" or the "Much Orientation," or Denise Donlon's office for that matter? That was part of the reason we missed some of the presentations we wanted to see.

When we walked in, we immediately became lost in the crowd, and the first part of the evening turned into an adventure exploring the maze of hallways and rooms. It was an "anything goes" mentality, where you could turn a corner and find a video camera in your face, or a bar (an open bar at that), or a Barenaked Lady.

Those Barenaked Ladies were popping up everywhere. They were there as we walked in. When we were at the bar, taking full advantage of the liquid refreshments, there they were.

If you were the upwardly mobile ambitious type, the night was a great opportunity to schmooze. Performers mingled with record company execs, video directors hung with industry types and lots of up-and-coming bands like Vancouver's Rymes With Orange, and the Gravelberries kinda crashed the party and talked to the press.

However, the best meetings were those that happened by chance, and it was way more fun just hanging out and people-watching. Example of a cool chance meeting with "Somebody Important:"

Strange-But-Pretty-Cool-Guy: So what's your excuse for being here?

Charlatan: We're press from Ottawa. (General discussion about alternative music, Furnaceface, and public radio follows.)

Strange-But-Pretty-Cool-Guy: So how do you like Ottawa?

Charlatan: It's pretty cool, it's got a great music scene, but it would be perfect if we had City-TV.

Strange-But-Pretty-Cool-Guy: Thank you. Did I mention I'm the president of City-TV?

Of course, some attention should be paid to the award recipients that night. Best Alternative Video went to Pure, who was nominated twice and also performed live. Perennial favorites The Tragically Hip won three awards but didn't deign to put in an appearance. Oh well, it was their loss. Maybe Gord Downie had to wash his hair or something.

The triumph of the evening, however, was undoubtedly Furnaceface beating out faves Moxy Frivous in the Best Independent Video category with "About To Drown." The Furnaceface video was shot partly underwater and was far more inspired than Moxy's sing-a-long-in-the-streets "King of Spain," so credit to Muchmusic for actually judging the videos and not being swayed by the Frivous following in Toronto. (Was that a Barenaked Lady standing in the background when Furnaceface accepted their award?)

The evening may have seemed out of control, but it worked. We had a great time, met some neat people, and saw some great live performances. Next year, a map of the awards area would make things easier, but compared to holding a sit-down ceremony, this was far better.

For example, I was able to be inside and very far away when Moxy Frivous performed "King of Spain" on the sidewalk outside the Much building. Congratulations also goes to security at the show for never getting impatient with people asking for directions ("Where is the orientation area?" "This IS the orientation area, ma'am.") and always being nice.

If you watched, you got an idea of how things were happening and maybe a better perspective on the presentations, but being there was half the fun. Muchmusic, in its own way, showed the absurdity of treating music, a form of entertainment, as something very serious. Instead, they made it fun. The American music industry should take note. □

Improv madness in Baker Lounge!!!

I must say that it got more laughs than the last CUSA council meeting.

The Sock 'N' Buskin Theatre Company held a five-hour improvisational marathon Oct. 1 in Baker Lounge.

When I first sat down to see the show I didn't know what to expect from a bunch of actors getting up on stage and acting out skits based on ideas provided randomly by the audience.

By the end of the show I had this unexpected urge to watch a sitcom.

This event served as a kickoff and fundraiser for the plays that Carleton's theatre company will be staging over the next two months.

When they weren't selling tickets or popcorn, the actors involved did a great job and they all showed an uncanny ability to think on their feet.

Most of the actors will be appearing in the company's first production of the year, Hell of A Mess, which premieres Oct. 27.

Taking suggestions from the audience and mixing in their own personal ideas, the group put on a spectacle that was amazing. Throughout they demonstrated a great versatility, acting out everything from sailing on a three-hour tour to walking down a catwalk at a fashion show.

Despite the various bizarre suggestions coming from the ever-expanding crowd — they made one actor bark like a dog — the cast's imagination never dried up.

Plus, their impressions of the characters they played (like Goldilocks and her furry friends) were astounding.

Another bonus was the music. There was keyboard accompaniment for many of the sketches, playing everything from the funeral march to hockey organ tunes.

The audience was with them throughout the five hours, especially when various audience members were taken up on stage to act out some scenes. This gave the audience a sense of being a part of the show.

Although the show was generally entertaining, it could have done without some parts. For instance, while the emcee stuck his head in a bucket of water for some scenes to wait until they finished, he couldn't do it all the time. This raises the question, "Why bother with this gimmick in the first place?"

Despite this, the improv was excellent. □

Huh?

Life is a monotonous, confusing entanglement of truth, emotion and deception, whereby morals, ethics, love, hurt and the realities of life combine together to produce what some may call human — or so-called human — life where men and women, or mostly (as far as the majority goes) boys and girls get together in what is supposed to be a harmonious, monogamous and healthy relationship where differences as well as similarities blend together into what we sometimes call happiness — But is it ever?

Library lets borrowers off hook

by Andrea Wiebe
Charlatan Staff

The library let delinquent faculty, staff and students off the hook to the tune of almost $11,000 in unpaid fines during its amnesty week.

Library patrons had the chance to return overdue material without paying any fines from Sept. 23 to Sept. 30.

The library counted 2,111 books returned during the amnesty week, compared to 1,258 books during the same time period last year when there was no amnesty, says Linda Rossman, the associate librarian.

Of the books returned during the amnesty period, 142 of them were considered "seriously overdue," which means they were at least six weeks late, says Rossman.

"We'd sent the people the replacement bill, but they hadn't paid the bill and they hadn't returned the books, so we counted them as lost," says Rossman. She says the 2,111 books that were returned would have brought in $10,900 in fines.

Of the 142 seriously overdue books that were returned to the library, 67 came from staff and faculty, and 75 came from students, says Rossman. They were returned by 39 patrons, 23 of whom were students, and 16 of whom were staff or faculty. The most books returned by a student was 27.

"That person saved himself $2,280 in fines," says Rossman. The most books returned by a staff or faculty member was 15, saving them $978.

The most overdue book returned was due June 6, 1980. According to Diane Gavin, at the circulation desk, the book was probably returned by a staff or faculty member.

"A few came back from 1987, 1988, and 1990, but really, most of the books that came back were from 1992-93," Rossman says.

None of the instructional television tapes that were considered lost came back during the amnesty week. "We had 25 in that category, and none of them were returned," says Rossman.

She says the library usually gets some seriously overdue books returned each year. "We got back 142 long-overdue books compared to 57 in the same week last year."

The number of lost books has also decreased this year compared to previous years, Rossman says.

Last year, the library considered 1,500 books lost. Rossman says this year, after amnesty week, there were about 670 books considered lost. She says higher fines may play a role in the lower figure.

"We also think there were fewer lost books because we raised our fines this year, including the replacement charge, it went up quite a bit," says Rossman.

The fines for overdue books were increased last November to 50 cents for each day the book is overdue, from 35 cents a day. The replacement charge for a lost book rose to $65 from $55.

The library's new sanctions policy began on Oct. 1. Students, staff and faculty who have more than three books or instructional television tapes overdue will have their borrowing privileges suspended until all overdue materials are returned.

Lisa Martin, a second-year psychology student, says she sees the sanctions as an annoyance. "If you're doing a project, and you have all these things due at the same time, the last thing on your mind is returning books. It's a total inconvenience if you have something due and you need those books. I think the limit shouldn't be three. I think the limit should be a little bit higher."

Rossman says 162 library patrons had their privileges suspended Oct. 1.

According to Deven Thakrar, a second-year law student, people are finding ways around the system.

"The fines are too tremendous for me to pay, and I can't take out books now, so I have to use other people's library cards," says Thakrar.

Though Rossman says she had expected many more books to come in, she says she thinks the amnesty week was still a success.

"Any time you get a book back that you thought you'd never see again, that's a success." □

Faculty network helps fix curriculum

by Prema Oza
Charlatan Staff

A new group at Carleton is working to help faculty members make the curriculum at the university more inclusive.

The Curriculum Transformation Teaching Support Network was designed to provide support for faculty members who support including material by and about people of color, women, people with disabilities, gays, lesbians and bisexuals in their courses.

"(We're looking at) ... a curriculum that reflects the diversity of the human race instead of the Euro-centric or white, male view of the world," says Carole Dence, director of Carleton's teaching and resource centre and network facilitator.

The network was formed after a group of faculty members attended a conference on curriculum transformation in the United States earlier this year.

Its goals, although not yet formally defined, will be to address any shortcomings of the curriculum at Carleton, says Dence.

"The current curriculum does not take into account all experiences," says Susan Gottheil, a network spokesperson.

Gottheil says concerns about the current curriculum come not only from faculty but students and administrators.

"There are accusations that the curriculum is heterosexist, ignores women's experiences and is class-biased in that it ignores the working class," says Gottheil.

Gary Anandasangaree, director of academics for the Carleton University Students' Association, says "from my perspective, it (Carleton's curriculum) doesn't represent me.

"In political science, I'm taught everything from a European, North American perspective," he says.

The network will focus on everything from course readings to alternative research sources and is open to students and faculty.

Right now there are a few faculty members and some former students in the group, says Gottheil.

"The network is in the process of emerging and taking shape," she says. "Its role has not been fully determined yet."

Gottheil says she is waiting for input from faculty and students at a meeting Nov. 1 before making more plans. The meeting will be the first formal one after the network was struck.

Gottheil says she and a group of Carleton professors went to a conference on curriculum transformation in New Jersey in April.

"The group went and we were excited by the keynote speakers and workshops," says Gottheil. "We felt good, and we wanted to meet to share ideas we were exposed to."

The state of New Jersey is a model for Carleton's network, says Dence. Twenty years ago, the state implemented a program to make all levels of education more gender-equitable. This was then expanded to incorporate other under-represented communities.

Fran Kladowsky, director of Carleton's institute of women's studies, says she

CKCU establishes sexual harassment policy

by John Steinbachs
Charlatan Staff

CKCU, Carleton's radio station, has introduced its own sexual harassment policy. The policy was ratified by the station's board of directors in September.

Max Wallace, CKCU's station manager, says the policy is "part of an internal clean-up at CKCU."

Wallace says when he arrived at CKCU in April 1992, he inherited a number of problems among staff and volunteers at the station, one of them being sexual harassment. Carleton's sexual harassment policy did not apply to CKCU because the station is not under the control of the university.

Wallace says the station had to develop its own policy because it deals with more than 350 volunteers, not all of whom are students or staff at the university. He says the most common form of harassment is one volunteer harassing another.

"It's not necessarily taking place by someone with power over someone else," he says. "Sexual harassment is everywhere. The question is do you recognize it? And what do you do about it?"

Wallace says CKCU put together a group of volunteers from the station and took a year to complete the policy. The group looked at over 100 policies from different organizations across Canada, with the help of Nancy Adamson, Carleton's sexual harassment adviser.

Wallace says a major part of dealing with sexual harassment is education. "It's an ongoing educational process. The definition of sexual harassment will always be posted in the office, saying it will not be tolerated."

Wallace says the number of complaints has "significantly decreased" since the notice was posted a year ago.

Sexual harassment has been defined to the staff in general meetings and workshops on sexual harassment are planned. Wallace says he plans to incorporate the workshops into other events, such as the station's monthly general meetings. He also plans to have workshops at quarterly meetings, which are mandatory for all volunteers.

Wallace says new volunteers will get information about sexual harassment "right from day one. The second they walk in the office, they will know what our policy is on sexual harassment, and that it isn't tolerated here."

CKCU's policy contains a framework for disciplinary action including mediation, counselling and dismissal, says Wallace.

CKCU's policy not only defines what sexual harassment is, it also defines what it is not. Wallace says mutual flirtation and hugs between friends are not considered sexual harassment.

Jane Keeler, Carleton's human rights educator, says sexual harassment in universities and the workplace is evident and serves as a way to keep women down by making them feel uncomfortable.

"I want women to go into the workplace with some encouragement that Debate over transcripts lingers

by Margaret Wilson
Charlatan Staff

The debate surrounding withdrawing from courses at Carleton isn't over yet. On June 8, the university senate passed a motion removing the WDN notation from all official transcripts sent out since that date.

Before, WDN appeared on your transcript if a student pulled out of a course after the final date to add a course, but before the final date to withdraw from a course without academic penalty.

This year, the final date to add a course was Sept. 24 and the final date to withdraw without academic penalty is Nov. 15 for a half credit and March 11 for a full credit.

A task force was set up in September to deal with "concerns expressed during the discussion of that motion," says Les Copley, Carleton's vice-president academic.

Professor Robert Lovejoy, the chair of the senate committee on admission and studies policy, says one question the task force will consider is whether to make the final dates to withdraw from a course earlier in the year.

Lovejoy says the Nov. 15 and March 11 dates may be unfair both to professors and to students who want to get into a course that is full.

"Faculty members complain sometimes because they've done all the marking and then the student withdraws," he says. "As well, they're taking another student's space."

Copley says he is concerned with the impact a change in the withdrawal date may have on Carleton's budget.

He says a motion to make the date for withdrawal without academic penalty earlier was actually passed in the senate as long as two years ago, but was never implemented "because of possible financial implications."

Bill Pickett, director of the office of budget planning, says an earlier deadline could cost the university in tuition refunds as well as incurring a lower level of government funding.

Funding for each university in Ontario is calculated based on the number of students enrolled at that university on the "reporting date," the date when each university tells the provincial government how many students are enrolled, says Pickett.

This year the reporting date in Ontario is Nov. 1, so the university is unlikely to require withdrawals be completed before that date, says Copley.

Schools such as Trent, Queen's, the University of Toronto, Brock, Lakehead and Wilfrid Laurier generally have an earlier deadline for withdrawal without academic penalty than Carleton.

A survey of available university calendars showed half-course deadlines ranging from Nov. 12 for Trent students this year to Sept. 30 for Queen's students last year.

Copley's vice-presidential task force on transcripts and related matters will also study whether other information currently given in transcripts should be removed, or whether relevant information exists which could be added to the present format.

Senate clerk Michel Gaulin speculated that the award of Canada Scholarships might be one piece of information that the task force may consider worth including on the transcript. Presently, some undergraduate scholarships appear on transcripts, but not graduate scholarships.

In addition, this task force may decide that the concept of "withdrawn in good standing" requires re-definition, says Copley.

Lovejoy says right now, a student who withdraws from a course with an F will still have the notation "withdrawn in good standing" on his or her internal audit, seen by students and their academic advisors or counsellors.

One thing the task force will not consider is the motivation which prompts a student to withdraw from a course, says Copley.

He says he hopes to fill this gap by introducing a program of exit interviews to be administered to students withdrawing from courses or programs given at Carleton. The interview would try to determine why a student has withdrawn from a course or program, says Copley.

Although there is no deadline for the task force's report, it is expected to be ready by the end of this academic year. □

A safety guide to Carleton's not-so-safe spots

Here is a list of safety tips compiled by the Carleton Women's Centre and the Foot Patrol.

BUS STOPS

Try not to use bus stops on campus alone at night. If you must, try and wait at a stop with a friend. If you are alone, the Foot Patrol will escort you to a stop and wait until a bus comes.

TUNNELS

Don't use them unless the weather is really bad. Familiarize yourself with the tunnels by touring around them in the daytime with a friend to find out where the security phones and exits are located.

QUADRANGLE

Don't cross through the quad between the library and the Tory Building alone at night.

LIBRARY

Study on the second floor in the evening — it is the busiest floor. Stay away from empty floors. Don't use the new bathrooms in the newer extension to the library building — they are isolated from the rest of the building.

LOEB BUILDING

Avoid Loeb lounge in the evening. Try and use the computer labs with a friend. Give the Foot Patrol a call when you go.

ATHLETICS BUILDING

Use the pedestrian tunnel running under the train tracks when going to and from the athletics building, as opposed to crossing over the tracks.

ST. PAT'S BUILDING

Don't use the road behind the building.

PATERSON HALL

Try to avoid Paterson Hall at night as well. Keep the Foot Patrol in mind.

RIDEAU RIVER PATH

This is a deserted area where daytime use is as dangerous as at night. Walk along the sidewalk running along Colonel By instead.

RESIDENCE BUILDINGS

Follow the lit path in between the residence buildings. The spaces between the buildings are very dark and isolated.

Use the lit entrances and ALWAYS lock your doors. Don't leave the building doors ajar either.

THE NORTH 40 PATH FROM RESIDENCE TO BRONSON AVENUE

Don't let the lights fool you. Don't walk on this path alone at night. The Foot Patrol will escort you across this area to Bronson Avenue.

PARKING LOTS

Lot 6, by Stormont-Dundas residence, is not safe. It is too big and isolated. The parking garage and lot by the athletics building are unsafe for the same reason.

Try and use lot 1 (by Oliver's, behind the Unicentre) or Lot 2 (behind the library). □

Tunnel gets overhaul

by Doris Gutenkunst
Charlatan Staff

The pedestrian tunnel under the railway tracks by the athletics building has been renovated to make it safer.

The changes cost $30,000 and came from the budget of Carleton's presidential advisory committee on personal safety.

Renovations to the tunnel included painting it white and the addition of lighting to the inside and outside of the tunnel.

The committee gets a $42,000 yearly grant from the Ontario Ministry of Colleges and Universities to work on campus safety, says Nancy Adamson, co-ordinator of the university's status of women office.

In past years the university has used similar grants to improve residence security, educate people about safety and install phones in teaching assistants' offices, says Adamson. This is the third year the university has received a grant.

There are also plans to put a safety mirror at the parking lot side of the tunnel and a chain link fence above the tunnel, says Tom Novosedlick, project co-ordinator for construction services. The fencing is to stop pedestrians from crossing the tracks, he says.

Last year the university worked mostly on the section of the tunnels from the residences to the Unicentre, painting the walls white and yellow, installing better signs and adding mirrors at intersections. This year renovations will continue from the Unicentre to the Loeb

Pedestrian tunnel a lot brighter at night.

ANDRÉ BELLEFLEUR

Building, says Adamson.

First-year student Christine Van Dusen says students can feel isolated walking across campus, especially at night.

She says she feels services like the Foot Patrol are inconvenient because you must either book an escort in advance or drop by the Foot Patrol office to have someone escort you.

Brenda Kennedy, co-ordinator of the Foot Patrol, says use of the Foot Patrol has risen over the past year by about a quarter.

"(We escort) anywhere from 15 to 20 people every night," she says. In spite of the changes to the tunnel, Kennedy says "there's no such thing as enough, until campus is completely safe." □

Carleton's school of industrial design has created a ring to "promote and encourage the visibility of our profession among other disciplines," says Jon Buss, president of the school's student association.

The winning ring was designed by Steve Jones, who graduated from Carleton's school of industrial design in 1993. It costs about $25.

According to Buss, the sterling silver ring represents the refinement of material, going from rough to smooth design.

Buss says he hopes the ring will become a symbol of the industrial design as a profession.

something can be done," says Keeler, who gave a seminar at Carleton on sexual harassment on Oct. 4.

Keeler says Carleton's sexual harassment policy, which covers students and university employees, concentrates on women and defines two types of sexual harassment.

The first is the "trading favors" type of sexual harassment, in which the victim is forced to trade sexual favors for advancement.

The second definition includes sexual comments, jokes or inappropriate touching. Keeler says this is the most common type of sexual harassment. "It doesn't matter if you're male or female, you've seen it."

Nancy Adamson, Carleton's sexual harassment advisor, says Carleton has had three or four formal sexual harassment complaints this year.

Most women who talk to her about sexual harassment do not follow through with their complaints because they're worried about the possible ramifications, says Adamson. She says these include fall-out from the complaint and self-doubt.

Keeler says men and women need to work together to address sexual harass-

Here at The Charlatan we get lots of mail — press releases, junk mail, hate mail and news tips. But by far our favorite inter-office communication is that from the senate.

No, not the house of sober second thought on Parliament Hill, but that haven of contemplation on the sixth floor of the administration building here on campus.

Not just because we love getting mail, but because the mail

Keeler says people have to speak out against sexist comments. She says fears which men have that their workplace is being restricted by the threat of sexual harassment complaints are unfounded.

Women have a right to work in an atmosphere which is comfortable and respectful, says Keeler.

hopes to see courses and curriculum change as a result of the group's work.

"I'd like to see more support for change and more discussion among faculty," says Klodawsky.

Gottheil says she believes one of the main problems with improving the curriculum is a lack of discussion among faculty about curriculum issues.

"A lot of things have been happening, but they (faculty) are doing them in isolation. They don't know what other faculty is doing. This network could provide them with a space to discuss what they tried to do," says Gottheil.

Dence says professors should try to share their experiences and ideas with one another and the network may be helpful for that.

Natural Law: not a bunch of flakes

by Ian McLeod
Charlatan staff

Neil Paterson says he is not just another flake.

The leader of the Natural Law Party of Canada passionately believes in the power of transcendental meditation and the group practice of Yogic flying as a cure-all for society's ills. Everything from the mental and physical health of the population to the battered economy, and even war, can be healed by Natural Law's programs, says Paterson, the party's candidate for the Ottawa-Centre riding.

Yogic flying is a process of transcendental meditation which can, when practised by a group of 7,000 people, exert a positive influence on society, says Paterson, a native of Saskatchewan.

The Natural Law Party has hit the ground running since its inception a year and a half ago and is fielding 231 candidates across the country in this election.

Among the candidates is illusionist Doug Henning, running in Toronto's Rosedale riding, who promises in his television commercials to be able to make the deficit disappear much as he would an elephant.

Many of those involved with the party use the title of "Doctor," including Paterson himself. But in his case, and in that of Henning, the title is misleading.

Both are listed in Natural Law's media information as PhD graduates of the Maharishi European Research University in Switzerland. But according to the Swiss Embassy in Ottawa, those doctorates are from an institute for private study and are not recognized as legitimate degrees by the Swiss government.

The university teaches the philosophy of the Maharishi Mahesh Yogi, a spiritual leader from India. Natural Law is founded on the Maharishi's principles.

A Charlatan reporter caught up with Paterson last week as he was filming television commercials in a downtown hotel.

Charlatan: A lot of people seem to be dismissing the Natural Law Party as a group of "flakes." What would you like to say to people to dispel this perception?

Paterson: The Natural Law Party is the only party that offers scientifically proven programs to solve many of Canada's problems, such as crime, violence and the lack of good health, or better health, among Canadians. No other party can make such a claim. We have scientific research to back up what we have to offer and I think that we have already seen in surveys that were conducted that the people of Canada are very interested in our programs.

So we have very specific programs to . . . eliminate problems in the country that others are completely at their wits' end about. They don't have any solution . . . to improve the health of Canadians, whereas we offer complete knowledge of prevention. We would introduce these prevention-oriented health courses which, we believe, could reduce disease by as much as 50 per cent within three years if they are adopted widely throughout the country.

Charlatan: Where did the Natural Law Party originate?

NP: Well, the Natural Law Party was first established in Great Britain — I believe that was last April, and the reason it was established (is) more and more, people are seeing that our whole approach to administering the country is inadequate and that governments are not able to solve the pressing problems, they're not able to prevent problems and they're becoming less and less effective in administering society.

As a result, of course, in this country, there's growing disillusionment with politics as usual. There's growing dissatisfaction and frustration amongst the people that their government is not effective. And when we heard that in Great Britain, some of our . . . uh, those people who practise transcendental meditation, they thought "well, why don't we form a party," and take to the people directly these programs that can solve the problems of the country."

Neil Paterson: an all-around serene guy.

Charlatan: On the subject of unemployment, in your information package there is a statement that "everything in creation has a function." It's a logical statement and a lovely thought, but the fact remains that everyone in creation does not have a job. What sort of job creation strategies does the Natural Law Party have?

NP: Well, we immediately would engage the unemployed in a national program of reconstruction in the country. And this, we would organize on the local levels with the mayors in each constituency — that the unemployed get job retraining and participate in a kind of national service to improve the infrastructures of the country.

On a long-term basis, what we are proposing (are) a number of things. First of all, we would introduce programs to develop the full creative potential of the citizens. Transcendental meditation, again, has been shown in scientific research to develop the full creativity, and . . . we believe all problems of economy, including unemployment, have their base in lack of creativity of the individual.

And also, we would encourage students to spend more years in education, to gain higher degrees, and also to have one year or two years of on-the-job training . . . technical training in specific skills in the profession which they're going into, so they're more qualified when they enter into the workforce.

We would also want to create a situation in the country that will give the opportunity for mothers not to have to work out of the home, so that they can be at home to nourish the next generation and care for their children, so that the next generation is very strong and vital.

Charlatan: Would it necessarily have to be mothers?

NP: (pause) Well, no one can replace a mother. Mother is mother, and particularly in the early years the child needs, we believe, the attention of mother. You know, there's no replacement for it. There's just no replacement.

So, we're not saying that this is something we would enforce. We're just saying we would create an economic climate in which it would not be necessary, or mothers would have the opportunity . . . they'd not feel forced that they have to go out of the home to work.

Charlatan: But how can the economy be influenced by meditation?

NP: All problems of economy, as I just said, are due to lack of creativity. And stress in the individual blocks their creative potential. On a national level, with a group of 7,000 Yogic flyers, this would dissolve the collective stress, the stress of society, which also, when it builds up in society, blocks the national creativity, and that's why we have economic recession and depression.

Charlatan: You've stated support for higher education, but education funding is being cut across the board. What would the Natural Law Party propose to do about that?

NP: . . . We can save the government up to $121 billion annually, because of wastage (and) the lack of efficiency in government and the problems in the country.

So, by reducing problems, what we're then able to do is shift more of the resources of government to that which is most important, to give every student in Canada the opportunity to study and even gain a degree, or into higher education, at least to have a bachelor's degree

New student group promotes higher tuition

by Lisa Young
Charlatan Staff

Some Ontario students will vote this year on membership in a new undergraduate lobby group which advocates higher tuition and automatic loans for every student enrolled in university.

At least five Ontario university student councils will hold referendums to decide whether or not the Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance can represent students better than the national student lobby group, the Canadian Federation of Students.

The University of Toronto, Queen's University, the University of Western Ontario and Waterloo University will hold referendums on OUSA membership this year. These schools have all left CFS in the last few years.

"The CFS has not concentrated on the right issues . . . and this has distracted them from concerns important to students," says OUSA spokesperson Rick Martin. "The structure of the CFS has made it unresponsive to students."

OUSA was formed last year by a group of student councillors, some from Brock and U of T, who were unhappy with CFS's representation of students.

Students at U of T voted to withdraw from CFS last year. Merry-LN Unan, external commissioner for U of T's student council, says one of the reasons she's opposed to the CFS is its unrealistic aim of wiping out tuition.

Unan says she supports OUSA's mandate of a 30 per cent hike in tuition as long as it is coupled with an increase in money given to member universities by private corporations.

"One thing OUSA has always made clear is that (it) will not support tuition hikes in isolation . . . OUSA feels the cost of education should not be borne by students alone," she says.

In September, the student council at U of T decided to delay their referendum until the spring to coincide with their the student council election.

Brock is already a member of OUSA. Student council President Mike Zywicki says he hopes students will confirm this in an upcoming referendum on Oct. 21.

He says tuition increases are a reasonable demand and can only have a positive effect on students.

"I think any change will be positive," says Zywicki. "The university will be reaping the benefits of the 30 per cent increase . . . it goes directly towards the quality of education."

OUSA intends to lobby governments to share the cost of post-secondary education more evenly among students, government and the private sector. Under their plan, students would pay more in fees but corporations would donate facilities such as computer labs and research grants.

Martin says OUSA also supports a new system of student aid called income-contingent loans, which would guarantee a loan to every student not less than the amount of tuition fees.

Students would then take out a loan based on their own assessments of how much money for expenses they would need for each school year. No repayments would be requested if the student made less than $22,000 per year after graduation. If the graduate got no increase in salary for 15 years, the loan would be totally forgiven.

"No one would have to pay more than a set amount of their income, no one would have to pay for longer than a set period of time . . . if anything it will be disadvantaging the rich," says Martin.

But OUSA is attacked by pro-CFS student politicians who say the new loan system means higher debt loads for students. Lucy Watson, president of the Carleton University Students' Association, says the university will "definitely not" become a member of OUSA.

"I think the CFS has always believed in the student, whereas OUSA seems to be pushing for something that could hurt students financially and academically," says Watson.

Jocelyn Charron, communications coordinator for CFS, says the current system of Ontario loans leaves students with an average debt load of $16,000 after four years.

"Already we think that's too much," he says.

Under OUSA's proposed loan system, Charron says students can run up a debt

Res debate focuses on student assistance

by David Docking and Stefanka Kirincich
Charlatan Staff

Local candidates proposed different ways of improving federal student assistance at the second Ottawa-Centre all-candidates debate held on campus.

About 60 students and members of the public filled Fenn Lounge in residence on Oct. 7 to hear the nine candidates, and one Natural Law representative standing in for absent leader Neil Paterson, speak about themselves and their platforms.

After the candidates gave brief opening statements focusing mainly on student issues, audience members had an opportunity to ask questions for over an hour.

Questions were, for the most part, directed at the four main parties—Liberals, Conservatives, Reform and NDP—and ranged from the Goods and Services Tax to the legalization of marijuana, but several focused on student assistance.

One student asked what specific changes the three traditional parties would make to the student loan program to make it more open to women, visible minorities and mature or part-time students.

Ian Lee, the Conservative candidate, said the Tories would open up the availability of the loan program to more students by eliminating the means test, which evaluates student need based on

Lee said he is unsure how to encourage accessibility for people entering university because he is a professor and it enhances the access to education" for special groups, he didn't offer any specific details. However, Harb said in his opening address that he would reinstate student grants for education.

Marion Dewar, the NDP candidate, said the loan program is inaccessible to certain groups because it lacks additional supports, like day care and English-as-a-second-language training, to encourage them to enrol in university and apply for student loans.

"The student loan program (must) be increased to the point where we can make sure that post-secondary education is available to all," she said.

Although the question of loans was not directed to him, the Reform Party's Len Tucker said his party would open up funding to students.

"You borrow based on your expected lifetime earnings and not on the means test, what your parental income might be," he said.

Another student questioned the Reform and Conservative policies proposing income-contingent loans, whereby students repay their loans based on their income after graduation. The student said a similar program in Australia failed and hurt those in a lower income bracket, especially women.

Tucker's only response was that Reform would revamp the Canadian Student Loans program so that students only pay back a portion of their loan when they are working at a pre-set salary level.

Lee, who favors loan repayment based on a percentage of a student's income after graduation, said the income contingency plan "does not affect your debt load, it affects the repayment of the debt you incur."

Student reaction towards the performance of the candidates ranged from pleased to perplexed.

"The Reform guy answered my questions the best," said Steve Jefferys, a second-year aerospace engineering student.

Paul Ferreira, in second-year journalism, said, "Marion Dewar put in a fine performance. I was also impressed by Ian Lee but, unfortunately, the PC Party is not viewed very highly."

Kevin Glew, a second-year journalism student, agreed, saying it was an "excellent debate . . . the Conservative candidate did very well."

Other students were not as impressed, however.

"The candidates didn't always answer the questions the way they should have," said Tim McNamara, a fourth-year political science student.

Kevin Lacey, in first-year political science, said "I think I'm more confused now than I was before the start of the debate."

In the end, cynicism prevailed for at least one student -- Christine Gough, in first-year journalism, said, "As we know, politicians are apt to say whatever they think the voters would agree with and then to immediately contradict that once they get to the House of Commons." □

Harb: offered no specifics.

Lee: favors income contingent loans.

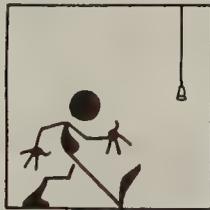

their own and their guardians' incomes. He also said the government should increase the maximum amount students may draw each year for loans.

"Campbell almost doubled the limits to $5,400, but I think they are going to have to be increased further than that," Lee said.

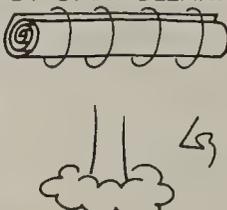

deals with students who are already in the post-secondary system. But he said he supports programs that encourage women to stay in math and science classes in secondary school.

While Liberal incumbent Mac Harb agreed that "the Canada student loan has to be arranged in such a way where Western's dying J-school may end up at Carleton

by Sara-Lynne Levine
Charlatan Staff

Carleton's journalism school may absorb faculty members from the graduate journalism program at the University of Western Ontario if the program's closure is finalized on Oct. 29.

On Sept. 29, Western's university senate voted 45-34 to close its graduate school of journalism as of April 1994. This vote was the second-last step in closing the door on the only other graduate journalism school in Canada besides Carleton's. Western's board of governors will meet on Oct. 29 to finalize the decision.

Western's university administration said the school is a low academic priority and cutting it will save $1.1 million over 10 years.

Michael Gourley, Western's vice-president academic, blamed underfunding from the province for the need to cut programs at the university.

"The provincial government will reduce money further by cutting transfers to universities. This leaves universities with no option," Gourley said.

The initial proposal to close the school, announced in April, sparked fierce, ongoing opposition from the school's students and faculty.

Western dean of journalism Peter Desbarats condemned the proposal, saying it was "ridiculous that a university would close a respected program like the J-school."

Members of the journalism school's class of 1994—the final graduating class if the program closes—staged an early-morning protest at the university's gates on Sept. 27, but they were unable to sway the votes of the university's senators.

Carleton's journalism department may hire some faculty from the Western program, said Peter Johansen, director of Carleton's school of journalism.

Johansen said Western's administration contacted Carleton's university administration with the news of the proposed closure in April.

"At that point, it was said that Carleton would consider making some offer to Western," he said. "That decision was announced to our faculty the same time Western found out the school would be closed."

Johansen said Carleton's administration has set two conditions for an amalgamation proposal.

"The first is that it wouldn't cost Carleton anything," he said. Since Western has already agreed that it would pay the salaries of those who left for the rest of their career, "salary was not an issue," said Johansen.

He said other costs would include renovating the radio and television studios, finding faculty offices and increasing the amount of classroom space. He said these costs would have to be covered by the provincial government.

"Informally, the province let Carleton know that they would do so."

Johansen said the second condition is that faculty at Carleton's journalism school must agree to accept the new faculty members.

"It was made clear by vice-president (academic Les) Copley that it was up to us whether we accept or not," said Johansen.

Johansen said the Carleton journalism faculty's decision will be based on three factors: whether the background of Western's faculty is appropriate, whether future enrolment demands would outweigh the increase in faculty and whether journalism school would have the facilities to deal with the undetermined increase in students.

"What it boils down to is the quality of education," said Johansen.

Carleton's faculty is already considering inviting Western's professors to teach at Carleton.

"At least three faculty meetings have been held on the issue," said Johansen. "The most recent was on Oct. 1, three days after the Western senate vote."

Johansen said Carleton has currently adopted a "position of neutrality, because it is still an internal matter at Western."

While the Carleton journalism school has adopted a neutral stance, negotiations have still been taking place.

"The hope of the upper administration at Carleton and Western is that a decision will be arrived at so that if Carleton makes an offer, individual Western professors will accept the offer by the end of January," he said.

The Western administration's decision to close the journalism school was met with harsh criticism. Over 500 letters and petitions were sent to the school by June 5.

Before the Sept. 29 senate vote, Jeffrey Shearer, publisher of Saturday Night magazine and Ted Eadinger, vice-president and general manager of CPFL-TV, met with Western President George Pederson to try and convince him to withdraw the proposal.

Shearer's letter to Pederson was signed on behalf of 11 Ontario media executives, including TV-Ontario chair Peter Herndorf and Keith Kincade, president of Canadian Press. In the letter, they expressed disappointment with the administration's plan to cancel the program. □

Local Reform candidates hear hecklers at open forum

by David Docking and Stefanka Kirincich
Charlatan Staff

The Reform Party's Ottawa-area candidates were given a rough ride by some students on racism and language-rights issues at an open forum held by the candidates on Oct. 7.

Four Reform Party candidates from the Ottawa area came to Carleton to answer questions from a large crowd of students crammed into Baker Lounge.

Peter Boddy (Ottawa West), Sam Dancy (Ottawa-Vanier), Gus Klovnan (Nepean) and Doug Walkinshaw (Ottawa South) came to Carleton to "introduce the students to the Reform Party," said Max Fishman, president of the Carleton University Reform Party Club.

Notably absent from the forum was Ottawa Centre Reform candidate Len Tucker. He could not attend the event because he was preparing for the all-candidates debate in residence later that evening, said Ian Whyte, the vice-president external for the Reform club.

For the most part, students were quiet at the open forum, interrupting the candidates only when they weren't answering the questions put to them.

But at one point the forum was loudly interrupted by a student who disagreed with Reform's policy of treating all Canadians equally in employment and promotional situations. The student seemed to contend that because employers are racist in their hiring practices, it is necessary to implement hiring quotas.

Walkinshaw responded by reiterating the Reform policy of the equality of all Canadians, saying merit was the best qualification for hiring.

The student refused comment to The Charlatan after the forum.

Another student questioned Reform's stand on bilingualism, saying Canada should have a national bilingualism policy because the French and English are the two founding nations. Walkinshaw, as well as some students in the audience, argued Canada was founded by Native peoples and, later, other immigrants who were not exclusively French or English.

When the candidates were pressed further on the issue of bilingualism and the difficulty francophones have finding French services outside Quebec, Klovnan said a simple solution was for people "to learn English."

In general, student reaction to the forum was positive, but many commented that a few students seemed to be there only to harass candidates, turning the discussion into a bit of a free-for-all.

Marty Rubenstein, a third-year commerce student who had come "to find out more about the Reform Party," said he found some students "pretty rude... they were asking their questions but they weren't listening to the answer."

Ron van Shaik, a student in third-year economics, agreed, saying "the hostility of the audience shouldn't have ever been accepted by the Reform Party." But he thought the event was valuable for "just making people think... I think that's the most important part."

However, Gifty Gyimah, a first-year law student, was displeased.

"I don't think my question was answered. I don't think I got much info from this that I didn't already have," he said. "I think the goal of the debate wasn't accomplished at all."

Other questions to the candidates at the forum ranged from Reform's plan to reduce the deficit to its policy on education.

As for student issues, the candidates said deficit reduction would stimulate the creation of new jobs in the private sector and that these new jobs would obviously benefit students.

Fishman said while there may have been some dissatisfaction with the forum and the responses, "the purpose of the event was to raise the profile of the Reform Party on campus and from the crowd... I think we can say that was accomplished." □ before they take their technical training. And also, we would introduce educational programs whereby students can develop the full potential of their consciousness. This is something that's been missing in education so far and that's why education has been inadequate, and in many cases unsatisfactory, to the students.

Charlatan: In Britain, I don't believe that anyone was elected from the Natural Law Party.

NP: That's right.

Charlatan: The attempts in Alberta and Nova Scotia were also unsuccessful. What do you think your chances are of getting elected at the federal level here?

NP: Well, first of all, just to comment on those previous elections. For example, in Alberta and Nova Scotia, actually, the Edmonton Journal said that we were really the big winner of the election in terms of the other, smaller parties because even though we had been in existence only three weeks, we did get one per cent of the vote in Alberta.

In this election, though, in my personal opinion... I feel that Canadians are more intelligent and more wise and that if they're able to hear about what the Natural Law Party has to offer... if the media takes it, and the people understand it, that they will vote for the Natural Law Party because the one thing they know for certain: other parties, the existing parties, the Conservatives, Liberals, the NDP, they don't have answers to these problems. They don't have solutions to the problems of the country. □

The enviro-friendly sewage system

by Debbie Poon
Charlatan Staff

A recently developed water treatment system which is environmentally friendly can recycle sewage instead of dumping it into the environment.

The system, not yet in use in Ottawa, uses natural ways to break down domestic and industrial sewage.

Professor Bryan Hollebhone of Carleton's chemistry department has been working on the system for 10 years, developing detectors that check the quality of the water throughout the process.

Hollebone says the system is better than the current water treatment systems. Unlike current systems, this one retrieves metals and makes fertilizers for resale and produces clean water for reuse. It also produces heat.

"If you try and make a river do this job, you're depending on the accidental capacity of the river, and it may not always be able to do the sewage treatment," says Hollebhone.

In the new system, initial breakdowns by bacteria occur in the very first tank. The bacteria break down waste chemically without using oxygen. They are the first step in this process, just as in nature. After that, the sewage moves into the second set of tanks, where different kinds of detoxificants work.

These detoxificants can be bacteria, plants, or animals, depending on the detoxifying process in each tank.

In the end, digestible substances become non-toxic and are converted to biomass, which can be sold as fertilizer. Poisonous metals such as mercury and lead and precious metals such as silver are trapped by specific plants. Heat produced as a byproduct may be used to heat buildings.

Hollebone says this environmentally friendly alternative is also cheaper, because it costs one-tenth of the current systems to install and one-fifth of the costs to run. He says one traditional $30-million sewage system in the United States was replaced by this new one for a cost of $3 million.

The system is being used in some parts of the United States and Toronto. Representatives from the Ministry of the Environment and the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton did not want to comment on the viability of the system.

While current systems involve expensive underground concrete networks, this system can be contained in a greenhouse. Greenhouses are easier to build and change around than a constructed water treatment plant, so the system can be manipulated easily as the needs of the community change.

Hollebone says the major problem with this new system is that people may not believe the treated water is clean. To show the public that contaminants in the water are below the trace level, which is the level harmful to people, Hollebhone has been developing analysis equipment.

These detectors check the quality of the water as it moves through 15 ecological tanks. When there is a problem, water is diverted into a holding tank. The old system only checks water at the end of the treatment. □

Proposals fail to root out racism

If a tree is rotten at the roots, do you continue to prune the upper branches or do you just chop the whole thing down?

The Ontario Ministry of Education proposals for stopping racism and discrimination on university campuses suggest you just keep pruning.

Last week, Ontario's education minister, Dave Cooke, announced that colleges and universities will have to develop policies calling for "zero tolerance of harassment and discrimination."

While the ministry's proposals look promising at first glance, they don't go far enough in challenging racism and discrimination at universities.

The ministry has two main proposals. One is that universities have guidelines that ensure governing boards are representative of the community it serves. This would mean guaranteeing spots on the board for students, faculty and under-represented groups, such as people with disabilities.

The other is that universities develop a "harassment and discrimination prevention policy." These policies would give people a way to complain about specific instances of harassment and discrimination on campus.

A big problem with the ministry's proposals is that universities who already have similar policies in place are given no guidelines on how they can improve further. This lets universities who already have some type of discrimination policy off the hook.

Forexample, if an university already had guaranteed spots on their board of governors for students, faculty and under-represented groups, it would be awfully easy for them to say "We meet the minimum standards, and that's all we're going to do about racism."

The other problem is that while the policy would allow overt incidents of racism and discrimination to be attacked, nothing addresses the much more difficult issue of systemic discrimination.

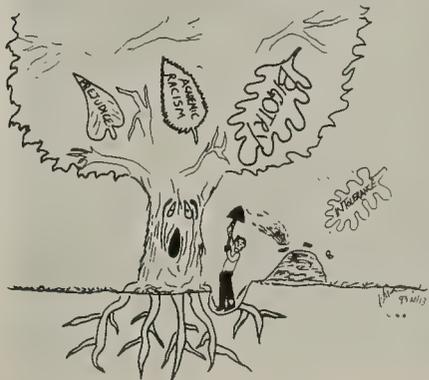

Racism and discrimination don't just happen on an incident-to-incident basis. A lot of discrimination at universities is built right into the system, making it difficult to root out. While overt racism should not be tolerated, it is as important to deal with the ingrained racism that exists at universities.

While the ministry's proposals are valid, they don't strike at the real problem. Fundamental issues, such as a curriculum that teaches almost everything from a Euro-centric viewpoint, are not even touched upon in the ministry's proposals.

The ministry's proposals are a good start for universities which don't have any policies in place. What the ministry should have done is make suggestions for further steps. For example, ways to integrate philosophies, other than the standard Western point of view, into courses and course material. While the ministry can't dictate what is taught to students, they could at least suggest that universities take a look at it.

Instead, they suggest trying to save a dying tree by treating only the top branches. Most people know that if you want a tree to flourish, it has to have healthy roots.

OPINION

Vegetarian for a healthy world

by Paula du Hamel

Paula du Hamel is in her last year of a double major in English and anthropology at Carleton.

When we think of being environmentally friendly, we gather our tin cans, newspapers and paper products to dump in the recycling bin. Some of us may extend our practices to shutting off the lights when they're not needed, tightening taps to prevent leakage and reducing water waste.

However, what we do not tend to admit, or control, is our attitude towards the animals we serve on our dinner table and the way they are raised as feed for our world.

I was taught that cattle roamed in pastures and were provided to me by the Creator for food. I lived with that, because I was not about to go out and hunt when I could go to my local grocery store. What I did not know (and probably should have investigated many years ago), is how our meats are raised and slaughtered for human consumption.

After attending a lecture on vegetarian ideology held by Carleton's Vegetarian Club a couple of weeks ago, I was shocked when they showed a film of the farming techniques some people use to raise animals.

The film showed baby chicks in the United States being held up to a mechanism similar to a bottle opener. Their tiny, soft beaks were wedged in to fit between the opening and snapped at the joining of the beak to their face. This technique is used to prevent them from pecking each other in their cramped storage quarters.

Some of these babies could not withstand the shock and died. Others bled. Their eyes were filled with unbelievable devastation at this predetermined course of existence had in store for them.

One comment made by a farmer in the film was that the procedure was "just like cutting toenails," an illogical statement because toenail-cutting never killed any living thing. Here, we saw baby chicks dying.

Some farms keep their animals boxed in a rectangular stall with their necks and head encircled by yet another cage which thrusts their faces into the feed. This is to keep them continually eating. These animals never see daylight or exercise their legs in a pastoral setting.

The film also made me aware of the chemicals and antibiotics fed to animals to prolong their lives. Animals being trucked to their destination often develop various ailments that hinder their survival and therefore decrease their market profitability. Hence the drugs.

While travelling in New Zealand, I was guilty of tasting as many lamb burgers as were offered my way. Somehow, I could justify my gluttony by assuring myself these creatures lived a full and healthy life. Since viewing the film, I've changed my mind and I've become a vegetarian.

As a Native person, I was taught to honor the animal and to thank the animal for providing its body for my earthly sustenance. Notably, most powwows I've attended serve wild meats. Interestingly enough, however, I was speaking to a Mohawk friend who, when I asked if there could be a broader vegetarian diet offered at next year's Montreal powwow, agreed that this idea would be taken into consideration.

My friend informed me that the ancient teachings of the Mohawks had included a vegetarian diet and that there were some who were strict vegetarians.

Today, we have supermarkets available to us if we're in the city and if we have some land in the country or a city garden we may grow vegetables. Any other things, such as grains to make bread, are easily available. Why then should we insist on buying meat, when animals' feed includes cement and drugs, yes, cement and drugs, used to speed up the process of fattening the calf and to bulk it up.

Why not develop better methods for the farming of vegetation and grains?

We have enough food to feed the hungry now, but somehow, governmental systems are against those whose bellies are empty. Much food goes only to the highest bidder, not to those who need nourishment.

We are definitely out-of-sync with nature and it's affecting our planet. We should all be aware of it, so let's fix it, and treat other living entities with the respect we know they deserve. The baby chicks did it for me. What will it take to convince you?

Do it defensively

Editor:

There are some really bad cyclists out there who give the rest of us a bad name. You know the kind — they bike on sidewalks and ignore stop signs. It's getting pretty bad. Here's an example.

A few weeks ago, my friend was biking down Library Road at a fairly fast clip. He was approaching another cyclist who wasn't going too fast. My friend decided to pass.

Without signalling, without even a glance over his shoulder, the other damn cyclist turned left. My friend was toast. He ploughed right into him and went head-over-handlebars onto the pavement. He landed on his back and had to be taken to hospital by ambulance.

Fortunately, he was not injured seriously, but what gets me is the sheer stupidity of that cyclist. What if there was a car coming instead of my friend? What if a car had been following behind my friend when he was thrown from his bike?

What the hell fuels the irresponsible behavior of some people? Riding a bike is like driving a car -- you've got to do it defensively.

With all the hoopla over the helmet law, I question whether or not the money would be better spent on education and skills development. Helmets can reduce injury, but proper skills could prevent them.

Don't curse the captain

Editor:

I was extremely offended by Marty Jones's lyrics, "The Captain was a one-eyed dwarf," in "Feds, dreads and toasted breads," The Charlatan, Sept. 30, 1993.

Such close-mindedness regarding Visually and Vertically Challenged Persons of a Nautical Persuasion (ViVeChaPe-NauPers) is unacceptable, especially from an artist of Jones's stature.

Haywire heating a health hazard

Editor:

Three years ago The Charlatan headlined a story on "Colds and claustrophobia in Carleton res," (Health Supplement, The Charlatan, Oct. 25, 1990). It included stories about university buildings and how they affect students' health.

The situation seems to have changed little. For three weeks students have had to sit with their jackets on, in a cold classroom. Others have been in boiling classrooms. It is a great atmosphere for learning, as the pedagogical specialists with their comfortable offices in the administration building well know.

Worse, however, is the situation of the university administration, which is applauding the discovery of underground water to heat the university. It is not enough that the first system still malfunctions; we now will have a second to reinforce it.

How much will that cost? Students bear their fees increased dramatically. That has not improved the heating or health situation.

In this period of restraint, has the university borrowed money to pay for this new system that might work as well as the old one? If so, how much and what will be the repayment cost? Will students fees increase, staff and faculty wages be reduced, and fewer faculty and staff hired in order to provide for this magnificent system which does not work effectively or efficiently? Does it mean the old system is impossible to fix?

Why is the university administration being so secretive? Why is the staff and the faculty and their unions so reluctant to ask questions about this costly improvement? Why are the students or their representatives so silent? Is it managerial prerogative with a vengeance?

It is not surprising to see upper management blithely endorsing spending while crying penury; students, faculty and staff remain frozen (or boiled) in their classrooms. Must be a question of empire building priorities.

No happy end to discount deceit

Editor:

Maybe The Charlatan isn't the right channel to make the following complaint, but it surely reaches enough people to stir the matter up.

As an international student, prior to my arrival in Canada, like everyone else, I received a batch of pamphlets, brochures, booklets and bulletins bragging about Carleton's services, including heavy advertising telling us to purchase the residence association's discount card. The card was intended to give us discounts at Abstemions, a residence store.

I bought the card. Only $5. So far, no discount to be seen. I am paying full prices.

Now, I'm not going to ask for a five-dollar refund. That's not the point. The point is the residence association lied, whoever runs Abstemions lied, and a lot of advertising led miserable, ignorant international students to believe this was a bargain. We took the time to fill a form out. Every time I go to Abstemions to claim a discount, I sound like a nut, pursuing a vain hope.

Some of the chaps at the residence association are really willing to help settle this matter, claiming the discounts will be in force "next week" and apologizing. Nevertheless, they can't seem to get whomever is in charge to write a happy end to this story.

Abstemions won't mind my quitting shopping there.

Halting Student Hunger

Editor:

This year the Queen's University Alma Matter Society has created the "Hidden Hunger Committee." We don't often think of how hunger affects people in our university community.

It's pretty easy to miss the students on campus who are struggling to provide for basic needs like food and shelter. Yet, there are hungry students who suffer from improper diets and malnourishment and they aren't nameless, faceless people. They may be your friends, neighbors, classmates or housemates.

Students are feeling the effects of these strained economic times. Some aren't able to get a part-time job or their parents are unable to provide financial assistance. Government grants and loans continue to face funding cuts. This all adds up to the reality of some students being in serious need.

Unfortunately, there's no real way to identify who needs help. Hungry students don't fit any stereotype of age, personality or appearance. But something can be done.

At Queen's University, the Hidden Hunger Committee is attempting to not only raise awareness of this issue, but to giving concrete help by organizing weekly food drives and setting up a hotline for students who need help.

We ask that Carleton students help our cause by setting up their own committee and join our nationwide campaign to give the issue of hunger a student voice across the province.

Deciding what is right and wrong

Editor:

Re: "You're pregnant," The Charlatan, Sept. 30, 1993.

Consider the statistic: "Number of aborted fetuses at a Bombay clinic out of 8,000 that were female: 7,999." ("The violence index," The Globe and Mail, Dec. 5, 1992)

Is this right? If you say yes, anyone who holds men and women as equally valuable will tell you that it isn't. If you say no, ask yourself, why is it wrong?

Well, violence against women and mass discrimination against the female gender. The only reason the proportion is such is because female life is so little respected in that Third World city.

Ah! Life. Female life. Yet, it is not respected in our society, not when female fetuses can be aborted just because another female, who votes and pays taxes, wishes it so.

Everyone's a Tory

Editor:

After the leaders' debates it has become clearer how this election is to be fought. Attacks on Quebec, the Bloc Québécois and on the legitimate wishes of Quebecers are now the common theme of all other parties, including (tragically), the NDP.

The International Socialists hope that these attacks will be opposed by English-Canadians. Other Reform Party policies have become common, such as their targeting of immigrants as a cause of crime and unemployment. The Tory Bill C-86 entrenches this attack by curtailing the right of people to live and work where they choose.

There is, on the federal stage, no real opposition to the various shades of Toryism. All parties accept the need to make some sacrifice, our sacrifice, to fight the deficit. It is not our deficit, but rather the deficit of undertaxed corporations and their Tory politicians.

Voting in this election represents a rejection of old politics. Rather than this dissatisfaction turning into a basis of political self-activity, many people, including those on the left, are rejecting policies altogether, and even abandoning the only party of the working people in Canada, the NDP.

We in the International Socialists feel this is a mistake. The election provides an opportunity to remember the despised Tory record and to expose the repressive economic plans of the Reform Party.

We can make our voices heard by people who might otherwise hear nothing but mainstream politicians. Come start an opposition that must continue regardless of the election results.

Seeing Re

by Clara Vermond

Clara makes lists. She makes all kinds of lists. There are shopping lists and "Books-I-Have-Yet-to-Read" lists. She makes clothes-to-buy and food-to-buy lists. Clara usually writes out lists for herself that she knows will stay on paper forever. The list of condos to buy outside of Canada is one example.

Clara is a waitress at a kids' hangout joint, even though no one calls them that anymore. The restaurant is really called "The Purple Palm" and Clara must wear purple from head to ankle. Her shoes are white. As a waitress, Clara usually only has enough money to take her from one week to the next. Although sometimes when the kids are extra generous with the tips (maybe only a buck more—but they add up), Clara saves the loonies and quarters in a jar so at the end of the year she can take a vacation. Sometimes she even drives by some of the condos she circled the previous fall while visiting Florida or California. But that's as close as she comes to being a serious buyer.

Still, she makes lists. Clara's favorite is the MAN LIST. That list is more complicated. She places her men into categories. There is the "past list," the "present list," the "long-term list" and the "fling list." The men she had sex with are given five-pointed stars. The kind she learned to draw in Grade 1.

Clara is 22 and has been involved with 14 men in the last five years (any before that don't count). It works out to 2.8 men a year, although she's unsure how she managed the .8 part. Whenever she has been dumped or cheated on or forgotten about she looks at the MAN LIST and pauses over the names and realizes that if she dates for eight more years there are still 22.4 men to go. That tends to cheer Clara up.

Clara has also managed to stay close friends with all but one of her past boyfriends. They call her up on Tuesday nights to watch movies and to drink a beer afterwards at a local bar. They tell her about their love lives or the lack thereof and she sits at the end of her seat, eyes wide, a half-mouth-smile that says "Oh, I'm listening and your story is the most important thing on my mind." Meanwhile, Clara ponders the list she wants to write up when she gets home. She is already thinking about the next day.

The end of the "date" always ends the same way, regardless of the man.

"Clara, why didn't it work out for us? What did we do wrong?" A gentle pleading. A flutter of prodding to get through her door. Clara doesn't like this time. They always say the word "we" as though she was part of the problem. As though she was partially to blame for the wanderings, the quickies in her kitchen with her best friends while she went out for groceries.

Clara does not have best friends anymore. She thinks it's rather ironic that she becomes so furious with her female friends while the ex-boyfriends always weasel their way into her life again. In a different form maybe, but they always come back. Maybe Clara expects more from her girl friends. With men, she thinks, at least she can dismiss their mistakes as emotional/sexual/social stupidity. She picks the one most suited depending on the offence and the offender. Clara thinks the women are supposed to be on her side.

The most elaborate list and the longest running is the "Where-I-Want-to-Move-and-Why" list. Clara has written down Sydney, Australia, San Francisco (for the houses alone!), Vancouver and Iceland. Vancouver would be the easiest destination to move to because she doesn't need work permits or visas and she doesn't have to prove to the government of the country that she has enough money to live on for two months. The Australian Embassy expected her to have four-thousand dollars. Iceland, Clara decided, would be too depressing after she got over the initial excitement of actually being there. Toronto is bad enough in the winter.

She realizes that she would like to be in Iceland to say, "I've lived in Iceland," and that is all. So, Vancouver it is. (The American Green Card for San Francisco, too lengthy a process.) Besides, the only boyfriend who does not remain a friend would be far away and Clara would never have to worry about bumping into him in a restaurant or bar ever again. That gives Clara peace of mind.

Clara is seeing a new man now. He is only a little taller than her and smokes self-rolled cigarettes and worries that she will move to Vancouver and forget about him. He has never told her this because he senses she wouldn't want to hear about it. He is right. He also worries about the Tuesday movie and drink dates Clara goes on. This, he does tell her and she laughs it off and swallows a few times. Clara skids off the car seat, gently closing the door behind her and never calls the new man again. She knows he will make an excellent movie partner.

Few people have ever gotten very angry with Clara. She is always punctual and rarely backs down on previously made plans. She rarely raises her voice above a conversational level and says please and thank you at all the right times. When Clara shows up at a party people pick their way over to her one at a time so that Clara is always listening to other's lives. Few people at these parties leave knowing graphic by David Hodges

what Clara does for a living, but they all leave with her face in their eyes.

David is at one of these parties. When Clara finally sees him, she is standing beside him and finds it impossible to move. He looks at her, crinkling his eyes like broken accordions, all wrinkles and no music. She lets out a moan, sways to the right and rolls her eyes up into her head. She pushes her way past a few acquaintances and heads for the door. When she is in her car she decides to go home.

Clara can't sleep for two nights and rubs old bruises and shakes in her slippers as she wobbles to the bathroom to be sick. Her boss is concerned and calls a few times to make sure everything is alright. Clara can not be faking — not with a voice like that.

When she finally does fall asleep, days later, Clara has dreams. Clara's dreams are unlike anyone else's she knows. They are larger than life movies. They have a beginning, middle and end. Clara's dreams replay life, but with more colors. In these dreams though, Clara always knows how the story will end.

In the dream, Clara sits across from David at her kitchen table and they are arguing. He complains about the number of male voices he hears on her telephone. He says he cannot trust her anymore. He says she lies to him and screws other men. David is getting angry. Clara has felt his anger before. It is stinging and hot. David's anger is a bullet ricocheting off the kitchen walls. Sometimes Clara gets hit.

In the dream she is thrown down on the kitchen floor of her apartment. It is checkered, black and white. Clara's nails tear into David's neck and she is choking on her own surprise. Her eyes are blurry and she thinks about the crumbs on the floor that her head is crushing. Another duty she must add to the cleaning list — sweep the floor. She wonders if she will come out of it alive. The dream is over when he leaves her apartment.

Of course the arguments with David were more three dimensional in real life. It wasn't just all macho jealousy that started it. Sometimes Clara still blames herself for the way the arguments began. It was usually a black shot at him — something stupid he had done in the past, like the lie she overheard him telling one of his friends about their sex life. He had never made her orgasm 17 times in a row. He rarely was into it enough to go for a double header. Afterwards Clara hated it when his friends looked at her with new interest, searching out signs of her unnatural power by the way she ate or sat or walked to the bathroom. Clara hated how their faces turned to each other as she left the room to get them a drink. Sidelong glances, a flick of a cigarette, a well-placed smile, David's friends still have nothing bad to say about Clara.

Fighting with David cost Clara six jobs. When she was all bruises and puss she didn't don cover up and dark glasses. Clara called in sick. The jobs lasted no longer than two months apiece but she never worried about finding a new one. Clara had lists of places to apply to. Within days she had a new uniform and new trays to carry. Finally, after a fight she knew would result in going over the job list again looking for job number seven, David left the apartment and never called her again. He began living with a friend of a friend. She had introduced them to each other a few weeks before. Clara's withdrawal was painful. She rarely ate or slept and hoped/feared he would show up in her bed. Sometimes she wondered why she had stayed with David for so long. But that was later. Towards the end, Clara could make jokes. She once told her last remaining female friend that she didn't see red when she was angry, only black and white checkers like those on the kitchen floor. Her friend only crunched her forehead and did not smile.

Clara saw David at the party over a week ago and is back at "The Purple Palm" again. Her dreams have stopped and she is circling newspaper houses to buy in Florida. Clara is making lists again. They have titles like "How to Get Money I Need to Move" and "People to See Before I Leave."

She is in her bedroom making these lists. Her feet are sore from standing on them all day. There are faint traces of blue veins running up and down both of her legs as she crosses them. When the lists are completed, Clara goes to the dresser to find a clean T-shirt to sleep in. Under one of her shirts she sees her old jewelry-box-with-a-ballerina and opens it. Clara lifts a fistful of dried crumbs from the box. She had taken them from her kitchen floor and saved them for over a year. The crumbs are all crushed to sand.

Clara opens the door to the balcony and looks out to the streets from 14 floors up. Everywhere there are lights; stars above her and street lights below her. Clara pushes a stick of hair from her soldered mouth and releases the crumbs from her hand, allowing the wind to carry them to Iceland. □

Anita stays put with Raven win

Driver Corry Burke scores five to pace team to victory

by Richard G.D. Scott
Charlatan Staff

Anita Phoque likes Carleton.

The Ravens men's waterpolo team defeated the Ottawa Gee-Gees 11-9 in the Seal Game Oct. 7 to capture its prized trophy — Anita Phoque — for a second straight year.

Carleton 11 Ottawa 9

The Seal Game is waterpolo's equivalent to football's Panda Game, celebrating Carleton's cross-city rivalry with the University of Ottawa. The trophy is a stuffed seal named Anita Phoque awarded to the winner each year.

After a disappointing season-opening loss to the Queen's Golden Gaels Oct. 3, Carleton wanted to even their record at 1-1 by winning their second straight Cup.

In front of Rodney the Raven and an energetic crowd of Carleton fans, driver Corry Burke scored five times and driver Stewart Mackie scored a hat trick, as the Ravens defeated the Gee-Gees in their first of two meetings this year.

But the Ravens did not score an easy victory against the far less experienced Gee-Gees. Through the first three quarters, the Ravens teased the Gee-Gees, never pulling ahead by more than two goals. In fact, the Ravens allowed the Gee-Gees to swim so close that the game was tied 7-7 for part of the third quarter.

"They did what they were supposed to do on offence," said Raven coach John Pankiw, "but they didn't follow our strategy on defence."

Finally, in the fourth quarter the Ravens flared up the opposition's net and scored three straight times.

But after that quick outburst, the Ravens again had problems controlling the Gee-Gees and maintaining their 11-7 lead. The Gee-Gees scored twice more before the clock ran out.

"They didn't play as well as I hoped," said Pankiw. "They gave up the ball too much."

With the Seal Game over, the Ravens will now look to improve their record against the tougher teams in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's waterpolo league at the University of Toronto tournament Oct. 16-17. This weekend, the Ravens will play Toronto, Western Ontario, McMaster and York universities.

Last season, the Ravens were 0-5-1 and outscored 73-38 against the combination of Toronto, Western and McMaster. Only in the playoffs did they squeeze a 10-9 victory against Western in the bronze medal playoff game.

"We're a much better team than we have been in the last two games," said Raven driver Steve Bell. "The game (against Ottawa) should never have been that close."

But the Ravens will still need to gear up their intensity to win games against the top teams of the league this year. The team will need to improve their ball control, their breaks and quick shots and most importantly — their team play.

"We're improving with each game," said captain Allemander Pereira, "but we still need to play with each other more." □

Field hockey fights back to tie McGill

Team winless in six

by Kevin Restivo
Charlatan Staff

A step in the right direction.

After their latest game, a 1-1 tie with the McGill Redmen on Oct. 8 at Minto Field, that's how one could characterize the effort of the Carleton women's field hockey team.

Carleton 1 McGill 1

The tie raises Carleton's record to 1-6-3 but leaves them in eighth place among the nine teams in the Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletic Association. The tie also runs the Ravens' winless streak to six games — two ties and four losses.

Carleton came out extremely flat early on and McGill opened the scoring at 2:22 in the first half. Redmen midfielder Stephanie Wolin capitalized on sloppy play in front of Carleton's net.

The Ravens trailed 1-0 at halftime but evened the score at the 30-second mark of the second half, when Raven midfielder Suzanne Bird poked in a shot after a pass from forward Krista Wilson.

Bird, like her basketball namesake, was a force the rest of the game.

"Sue really helped out today. She made a good overall contribution," said head coach Suzanne Nicholson, commenting on Bird's performance.

The Ravens created tons of scoring opportunities, but they couldn't capitalize on any with the exception of Bird's goal.

"Even though we missed some opportunities, we're really starting to see the spaces well," said Bird. "We played really strong, much like we did against York (in a 1-1 tie)."

Even McGill, who beat Carleton 2-1 on Oct. 3, noticed the improvement.

"Carleton's improved a lot over the season," said Wolin. "They really came on (in the second half). If we hadn't have scored early on, who knows what would have happened."

The match left everyone enthusiastic, including Nicholson, who noted the team is really starting to gel and play well together.

But Nicholson does admit the rest of the schedule isn't favorable to the Ravens, who are hoping to land the sixth and final spot in the OWIAA field hockey league.

"We're playing Toronto, which is one half of the national team, and then we've got York, which is the other half of the national team, so we're definitely in tough."

The Ravens play the league-leading University of Toronto Blues on Oct. 15 and the York Yeowomen on Oct. 16. □

Overconfidence leads Ravens down the dark path

by Sarah Richards
Charlatan Staff

Yes, they are human.

Despite the undefeated 6-0-2 record in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's east division, the media attention, and the general hype around the Carleton men's soccer team, one thing is clear — they have weaknesses just like any other sports team.

"There's a lot of talk about us being very experienced just because we've been to big games. But just because you've been playing for five years doesn't mean you're mature enough to handle the situation on your own," says five-year veteran stopper and twice all-Canadian Earl Cochrane.

And in a period of seven days, a lack of maturity has resulted in a lack of discipline. The overconfident Ravens tied two of the eastern division's weaker teams — the 1-5-1 Trent Excalibur and the 3-4-1 Queen's Golden Gaels.

"Sometimes we think we can lapse with these teams and they won't punish us, but they have managed to," says Raven goalkeeper Stevie Ball. "I don't know... (the ties are) a bit of a mystery."

The ties leave some players like midfielder Joe Gabor saying the style of soccer the Ravens play is geared more towards stronger teams like Toronto and Laurentian.

"The style we play sometimes works against us," says Gabor.

In soccer, it's all too easy to abandon game strategy and sink down to the level of inferior teams. Before you know it, crisp ground passes disintegrate into unthinking boots upfield.

But the Trent and Queen's setbacks go beyond that mistake, beyond the black and white chalkboard of game strategy and technique.

"It almost seems like immaturity is creeping in," says Cochrane. "(The players) need someone there to be on them all the time, need someone yelling at them. It's annoying at times, to see it from the bench. People have to start realizing what they have to do as individuals."

And what they have to do as individuals doesn't include locker room predictions on how many goals will be scored against weaker teams like Trent.

Whatever the reasons behind the two mysterious ties by the Ravens, there is some irony in the whole thing. In their drive towards the OUAA east division playoffs, and maybe even in their grail-like quest for the CIAU national championship, the Ravens have stopped concentrating on the little games that may, in the end, count most. "I think people have to start focusing on the game at hand and not worry about two games down the road," says Cochrane.

Weaknesses are acceptable. A lack of maturity is not.

And if the Ravens truly do dream of a national title, they better start taking these so-called little games against weaker teams a little more seriously.

Or their dream might turn into a nightmare. □

Ravens we remember come out to play

Golden Gaels win rematch easily

by Derek DeCloet
Charlatan Staff

For the Queen's Golden Gaels, revenge was like an after-dinner mint that someone just spit out.

Sweet and sloppy wet.

The Gaels avenged their 25-20 loss to Carleton Sept. 25 by drubbing the Ravens 26-8 on a rain-soaked Raven Field Oct. 9.

"I guess it kind of was a little bit of revenge," said Queen's quarterback Steve Othen, who was 13 for 29 with three touchdown passes. "They beat us on our home turf, so we wanted to beat them made his first start of the year and was ineffective. He completed just 4 of 15 passes and threw an interception that set up the Gaels' first touchdown, a 24-yard pass from Othen to his brother Paul in the second quarter.

Sean O'Neill took over to start the second half with the Ravens trailing 13-1 and threw an interception to end the Ravens' first possession. Soon after, Othen hooked up with Gaels' receiver Paul Kozan for a 63-yard score and a 19-1 lead.

After the catch, Kozan found himself quickly surrounded by several Raven defenders, but managed to elude them until Queen's could give him some blocking help. When that help arrived, Kozan scampered the rest of the way for the touchdown.

"I stopped because I knew if I continued on straight, (a Raven) would have tackled me from behind," said Kozan. "(They) sort of ran past and then I kind of danced around. The blockers down-field did a great job."

Ten minutes later, O'Neill connected with linebacker Stephen White for the

It was a crappy day for the Ravens even though they managed to stay on top on this play.

Ravens' only touchdown to narrow the gap 19-8. But any hopes of another comeback were quashed when the Othen brothers linked up for another 20-yard TD pass.

Matt Tickell took over for the Ravens in the fourth quarter, but couldn't sustain any drives heading into a suddenly brisk wind.

The 2-3 Ravens are now tied with McGill and Queen's for third place in the Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference. Their next game, at Concordia on Oct. 16, will be critical to their playoff hopes. Only the top four teams in the O-QIFC make the playoffs. □ here."

Carleton was beaten in every aspect of the game, but especially on offence.

"All phases of the offence were just not functioning today," said Raven coach Donn Smith after the game. "The receivers were dropping the passes (when) they were wide open, the quarterbacks weren't finding (the receivers), and the running backs just weren't hitting the holes. And on top of all that, the offensive line just wasn't blocking."

The Ravens could muster only 78 yards on offence, compared to 370 for Queen's. In fact, Carleton used almost as many quarterbacks — three — as they had first downs — five.

"We're just going to have to re-evaluate who will be starting quarterback next week (against Concordia)," said Smith.

Football men remembered

Saturday's game was dedicated to the memory of two football men who died last week.

A former Raven offensive linesman, Sudbury Const. Joseph MacDonald was shot several times and left to die beside his police car after pulling over a car on Oct. 7 in northeast Sudbury. The father of two young girls died shortly after arriving at the hospital.

MacDonald, who graduated from Carleton in 1988, was a member of the famed McHog line of the mid-1980s, when the Raven football program was a force in the country.

A moment of silence was observed and the Ravens all wore MacDonald's old number, Number 55, on their helmets in his honor.

Earlier in the week, Frank Tindall, the legendary coach of the Queen's Golden Gaels, died on Oct. 5. He was 84. Tindall died as a result of head injuries from a fall two weeks earlier. Tindall, a former coach of the team, led the Golden Gaels to a 111-84-2 record over 29 years. Under his guidance, the Golden Gaels won eight conference championships and the Vanier Cup in 1968. □

Sooner spirit inspires Ravens

Former junior champs brings winning attitude to the dressing room

BRIEFS

The Carleton Ravens rugby team lost 17-9 to the Royal Military College Redmen on Oct. 7. It was their first loss against four wins and the team must now win their last two games against Toronto and Trent to guarantee themselves first place in the OUAA division II rugby league and an appearance in post-season action.

The Carleton hockey team opened their new season in the senior R.A. league the same way they ended their last one — with a loss to the Abloom hockey club.

Abloom bounced Carleton in the first round of last year's playoffs and continued the punishment Oct. 6 at the R.A. Centre with a 4-2 win over Carleton.

"It's tough when you have 18-year-olds playing against 30-year-olds," said general manager Paul Correy.

Carleton's new sailing club placed last in the All-Star Involuntary Intercollegiate Regatta in Toronto Oct. 9-10, competing against university sailing clubs from Queen's, Brock and Western Ontario. Carleton fielded one team in the lightning class boats and competed in six races. Queen's won the regatta.

CALENDAR

Friday, Oct. 15.

HOCKEY -- The Carleton hockey club will face off against Brock's St. Lawrence College in exhibition action at the R.A. Centre. Game time is 1:30 p.m. Tickets are $1 at the door.

FIELD HOCKEY -- The women's field hockey team will be in Montreal looking to improve on their 1-6-3 record against the 10-0 University of Toronto Blues in a 4:30 p.m. match.

Saturday, Oct. 16.

FOOTBALL -- The 2-3 Ravens football team travels to Montreal this weekend to kick off against the 3-2 Concordia Stingers. With only two games remaining in the season, the Ravens need a win to keep their playoff hopes alive.

FIELD HOCKEY -- The women's field hockey team will continue its road trip in Montreal, facing off against the 7-0-2 York Yeowomen at 9 a.m. and following that up with a 1:30 match against the 0-11 Trent Excalibur.

RUGBY -- The 4-1 rugby team will host the 3-2 University of Toronto Blues on the Carleton rugby field at 1 p.m. The Ravens must win their remaining two games to make the playoffs.

SOCCER -- The 6-0-2 Raven men's soccer team will host the 5-3-1 Laurentian Voyageurs on the soccer field at 1 p.m.

WATERPOLO -- The men's water polo team travels to Toronto this weekend to take on the McMaster Marauders at 1:30 p.m. and the Western Mustangs at 6 p.m.

The men's soccer team will continue their home-stand against the York Yeomen in a 1 p.m. match.

WATERPOLO -- The water polo team continues its road trip with games against the Toronto Blues at 10:30 a.m. and the York Yeomen at 1 p.m. □

They are about as varied a group as you're likely to find on a university football team.

The difference between the heaviest and lightest players is nearly 100 pounds. Tallest and shortest? Seven inches. There is a speedy cornerback and a stocky linebacker and a lanky kicker, and just about everything in between.

But there's one thing these former Ottawa Sooners all have in common: a winning attitude.

"You can't help but appreciate the fact that you can bring players in that do know what it takes to win," says Ravens' head coach Donn Smith.

Smith has ties to 11 ex-Sooners, including six rookies, who are now on the Raven roster of 56. He spent the last two years with the Sooners, as a co-offensive co-ordinator and offensive line coach.

The Sooners play in the Ontario Football Conference, a league made up of players under 23.

Most are university-age players who, for a variety of reasons, have elected not to attend university and play varsity football. For the playoffs, the OFC joins with other leagues like it in Canada to form the Canadian Junior Football League.

The Sooners made it to the championship game in each of Smith's two years. In 1991, they lost to Saskatoon. Last year, they beat the Surrey Rams to claim the CJFL title.

Smith says experience helps those players now.

"These guys have been to the top twice, so they know what it takes."

Wayne Wilson returns a kickoff.

The attitude is contagious around the locker room, says Raven quarterback Shawn Thompson.

He should know. Thompson played for the Ravens in 1991, jumped to the Sooners last year after a poor academic year, and has returned to the Ravens' nest this year.

"You bring guys that have won national championships... they bring that (experience) with them and they pass it around the locker room," he says, noting that players who haven't had the Sooners' winning experience often ask him about it.

With Carleton's early success this year, and with Smith's connection to Sooner head coach Greg Marshall, one can be sure the Ravens will continue to put ex-Sooners on the field.

"He (Marshall) is a full supporter of the Raven program," says Smith. "He will do his utmost to make sure that any of his players who wish to go on to school will be coming to Carleton." □

Quarterback Shawn Thompson has been mighty effective in a back-up role.

Ex-Sooners have been instrumental in the Raven football team's early success. Here, then, are the 11 former Sooners who now wear Raven black:

Chris Giacobbi, kicker: Last year, he led the team in scoring with a measly 14 points. This year, he already has 18.

Shawn Thompson, quarterback: Thompson replaced struggling starter Sean O'Neill at Queen's and rallied the Ravens to a come-from-behind victory.

Wayne Wilson, cornerback: A speedster who handles kickoff returns.

Sean Baptiste, free safety (rookie): Baptiste has taken over as "quarterback of the defence" for Mark Senyshyn, an O-QFC all-star in 1992.

Joey Ducharme, linebacker (rookie): He's one of those guys you're happy is on your team, not on the opponent's team.

Bruce Bacheider, centre: In his second year with the Ravens, Bacheider is one of the team's offensive captains.

Harry Van Hofwegen, defensive end (rookie): Van Hofwegen is off to a monster start, leading the conference with five quarterback sacks.

Scott Bishop, nose tackle: A pleasant surprise. "We had no idea he was going to be able to play the level he's playing right now," says Smith.

Greg Kenney, wide receiver (rookie): Smith says Kenney has sure hands. "He'll make the big catch for you when you need it."

Jeff Koradi, running back (rookie) and Mike Lavery, defensive end (rookie): Koradi and Lavery are both former Sooners who practise with the team, but are not playing because they are not full-time students.

Raven men lapse leads to a soccer tie

Stopper Cochrane missed on the field

by Sarah Richards
Charlatan Staff

The field conditions were right. Personnel was not.

When the 6-0-1 Carleton men's soccer team kicked off against the 3-4-0 Queen's Golden Gaels on Oct. 7 in Kingston, there was a lazy sun warming the still air and the pitch was in good shape.

But missing from the Carleton lineup were forward John Lauro and stopper Earl Cochrane.

Carleton 2 Queen's 2

Lauro had the flu and Cochrane was suspended for the Queen's game after taking his third yellow card against Ryerson on Oct. 3.

It shouldn't have mattered. But it did, as the Gaels fought back from a two-goal deficit to tie the Ravens 2-2.

Carleton scored first at the 14-minute mark when rookie striker Marty McCaffrey beat two defenders in the corner and scored a low shot to the far post

"I was thinking of shooting earlier because the goalie was off his line, but I decided to try to take (the ball) in and beat the defender," said McCaffrey. "If we had more chances, we should've tried to get the ball over the keeper, because he was really moving off his line a lot."

Two minutes later, the Ravens heeded his advice.

McCaffrey crossed the ball to midfielder Chris Scuccato sitting in front of the net. The Queen's goaltender was left out of position for the save.

"The keeper, for some reason, was way out of his net," said McCaffrey. "For a shot from that far, I don't know what he was doing."

CHRIS NUTTALL/SMITH

Cochrane was a force the last time the Ravens played the Gaels winning 4-1.

The Ravens dominated the first half of the match, but the second half was a different story.

"The guys sat back, took it easy and felt that two goals were enough to seal the win, but it wasn't," summed up midfielder Andrew Woolldridge. Call it déjà vu of the Trent game when the Ravens tied the last-place Excalibur 1-1.

Queen's may have been less skilled on the ground, but they were dangerous in the air. The Gaels' centre-midfielder placed his long throw-ins perfectly between Ball and the Raven fullbacks.

"We lost two balls in the air, and those cost us the goals," said Ball.

It wasn't long after their first goal that the Gaels evened the score.

"They just got up after that goal, and it was like a domino effect. They just kept getting better," said Woolldridge.

Despite commending the work of stand-in stopper Ian Wright, some players said the outcome may have been different had stopper Cochrane played.

"Earl just has a presence on the field. Those two plays might not have happened because Earl would have got his head on it or he would have been first to get to the ball," said midfielder Joe Gabor.

Said Cochrane afterwards: "I think the calming effect (of my presence) would have helped."

Cochrane and Lauro will be in uniform when the 6-0-2 Ravens take on the 4-2-1 Laurentian Voyageurs on Oct. 16. □

Soccer women lose game and still make playoffs

by Natasha Rapchuk
Charlatan Staff

You take the bad with the good. That's the latest lesson learned by the Carleton women's soccer team.

Even though the Ravens suffered a 1-0 loss to the top-ranked Queen's Golden Gaels on Oct. 7 in Kingston, they still clinched a playoff spot in the Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletic Association's east division.

Queen's 1 Carleton 0

Last week, the Trent Excalibur lost 2-0 to the University of Toronto Blues and the Ryerson Rams lost 3-0 to the York Yeowomen. With only three games remaining in the season, neither team has any hope of catching the Ravens for the fourth and final playoff spot.

The Ravens held the Gaels until the 20-minute mark of the second half, when Queen's forward Deb Cancian slipped through the Carleton defence to score.

The Ravens, not renowned for their scoring prowess, were unable to respond — missing two open-net chances and hitting a crossbar.

"They can play with the best of them, but they have to score a goal to win," said Kent of his team. "That's 1993's Achilles heel, that no one on the team has come forward and become a scorer."

But Carleton's scoring record is an improvement over last year. This time last year the Ravens had scored seven goals. They've scored 12 so far this year.

Kent is proud of that progress, but sees a problem with it.

"No one has taken charge," he said. "There are six different people who have scored the 12 goals. That's a wide spread."

Despite the lack of scoring finesse, the Ravens did manage to pepper the Gaels' goalkeeper with some difficult shots.

"(Carleton) had some chances," said Queen's assistant coach Marco Giacomello. "Our keeper made a great stop in the first half. Otherwise, Carleton would have been one up on us, and it would have been hard to come back."

The offence may have been lacking, but the defence was not.

Kent praised the play of his defensive players, especially goalie Kristina Bacchi, who's averaging less than a goal a game. □

Bo Diddley does the blues, and then some

by Chris Nuttall-Smith
Charlatan Staff

Bo Diddley
Penguin Rock Bar
Oct. 8

For the most part, Bo Diddley's performance was incredible. His dancing, playing and singing had the full house at the Penguin hooting with laughter and screaming in approval for most of his Friday night gig.

Diddley warmed up the worshipping crowd with "I'm A Man," dancing and shaking his knees better than Elvis ever could. His satirical rendition of a less-than-romantic husband in "Shut Up Woman," with equal parts talking and singing, had the crowd roaring. It was shaping into a historic event.

The historic feeling continued into the next tune, which was hardly characteristic of Diddley's usual blues and classic rock. No one expected to hear country from Bo, but with help from his cracker-jack band and lots of communication with the crowd, he pulled off "Promises, Promises" with gusto — bragging "I jus' wrote that song a week ago."

Switching genres once again, Diddley didn't really impress with his rap song "I'm Gonna Get Your Girlfriend." The song's only redemption was its hilarious lyrics and primal Jungle Book beat.

The rock and roll legend moved back to familiar ground with a short rendition of "I'm a Roadrunner, Baby" before blowing the roof off the house with a 25-minute epic instrumental, complete with strumming, hip shaking and the occasional "Come on, Come on!" into the mike. Only Diddley could have had middle-aged women dancing in the aisles amidst a frenzied audience, without him singing one note.

The next bit was a show-stopper. With his grassroots blues voice and twangy guitar, Diddley delivered the ultimate blues performance. This had to be it. He was finally playing the classic Diddley the crowd came to hear — maybe he'd even do "Hey Bo Diddley."

But he didn't.

Diddley closed what had been an incredible show with a 10-minute, out of place, overly paternal lecture about kids and society today and a third-rate, bleeding heart rap called "Kids, Don't Do It." Rap's hard enough to listen to when it's good. Unfortunately, Bo don't know rap.

Talking with Diddley after the show was almost as hard as listening to him rap. The man was more interested in raving on about the problems with kids today and how the hippie generation is to blame for them than talking about his music.

Back to more familiar music territory, he didn't seem confident about the future of guitar: "Unless we turn around and go back, we're movin' out of the plain electric guitar; we're movin' more into the electronic stuff," he said.

When asked how long he would be playing he said "I'm not lookin' to go anywhere soon. You're gonna be botherin' me a long time."

Diddley was excited to tell of how he discovered the guitar. "I took violin lessons for years when I was a kid; all I ever did was play scales."

He sang a scale and laughed. "Then I discovered the guitar," he said. "My mother didn't like the guitar though, she said it was devil music. All I said was 'The devil never paid me.' I was on the move when I said it."

And after 46 years of shaping rock and roll, Diddley is still on the move. Aside from being weighed down by a disappointing last number, his performance was amazing. That it took place in such a personal venue made it unforgettable. □

Fires of Kuwait light up screen

by Dahila Tanasouli
Charlatan Staff

Fires of Kuwait
Cinéplus (Museum of Civilization)
Directed by David Douglas

Fires of Kuwait is a stunning documentary, where a small film crew follows a team of a dozen professional firefighters into the oily, dark desert of fire. And it's all brought to you on the larger-than-life IMAX screen.

As the Iraqi troops were retreating at the end of the Gulf War, dictator and pyromaniac Saddam Hussein ordered more than 600 oil wells to be sabotaged.

As the war ended, another battle was beginning.

Originally, David Douglas, the director of Blue Planet and Rolling Stones At The Max, needed only some short footage for a segment on air pollution for another movie. Douglas and co-producer Di Roberts were encouraged by their producer to bring along extra film. They soon realized that the plains of fire were more than just an environmental disaster.

At a press screening for the film, Douglas said he made the movie to document the heroes that risked their lives putting out those fires. He also wanted people to realize the true "cost of victory."

The film crew followed Texan Wild Well teams, led by veteran oil well firefighter Joe Bowden Sr., depicting the extraordinary conditions these men and one woman endured.

Throughout, they wore only long johns and thin coveralls that were usually soaked in water and crude oil. In order to get close enough to extinguish the uncontrollable fires, they had to withstand tremendous heat. Oil fires burn at about a thousand degrees Celsius.

The biggest risk to the firefighters came when the fire was out, but the oil continued to shoot up from the ground. This is the most critical time, with a whole area just waiting to flash into flames again.

In one instance, a Romanian team lost some of its crew when natural gas built up and ignited the area. Although teams from other countries were profiled briefly, it would have been nice to see more of the international teams. The film focused very much on the Texan team, while other teams had worthwhile stories of their own.

The Hungarians had an innovative system to put out fires. They converted an old Russian T-34 tank by replacing the gun turret with two jet engines from a MiG21 fighter plane. This contraption literally blows out a fire with a high powered stream of water and wind. The Canadian team invented a prototype called "Foamy One," but unlike the Hungarian contraption, you won't see it here.

The roar of the images on the screen was punctuated with quiet, moving scenes of what was left behind in the desert after the war.

In one scene, there was an abandoned truck in the desert, the sand around it littered with lost valuables and a rusty sewing machine sitting upright and ready. Douglas represented the impact of the war on the Kuwaiti people without the traditional "suffering population" clips, but the point was well taken none the less.

From the clips of the empty trucks to the scenes of a machine scanning the beaches for land mines, it was made clear that the people of Kuwait are just starting to reclaim their skies. Their land, economy, and society lie in ruin. When the thick clouds gave way to the sun, the true extent of the damage was visible. The desert was a landscape of tar and lakes of oil.

This movie moves the viewer with touching and frightening images. The narration is kept to a minimum, letting the images speak for themselves. Douglas is a master with the IMAX camera; his handiwork only adds to the story.

I left the theatre changed by the movie because it wasn't just a movie. It was an experience.

When Bowden was asked to describe the oil fields, he said with his southern drawl, "... there's no words around to describe what we saw when we came here." □

Lowest of the Low with Acoustically Inclined Zaphod Beeblebrox
Oct. 6

Lowest of the Low is riding a wave of success that brought them splashing into Ottawa for part of their "I Oughta... #@%! Tour."

And they didn't disappoint. Winnipeg's Acoustically Inclined opened up the evening with their own special blend of music, which combines folk, bluegrass, rock and a healthy dose of punk. When asked where their musical roots lie, they are quick to name Nu Grass Revival as their principal inspiration.

The high points of their performance were the intricately carved and aggressive violin solos and country reels. Watch for this upbeat group on CBC's Ear To The Ground in January, and a return to Ottawa shortly thereafter.

The beginning of Lowest of the Low's set was uncharacteristically subdued. They apologized to the crowd, saying, "We're not usually up this early," referring to Zaphod's policy of starting shows precisely at eight o'clock so they'll be over by 11 p.m. in time for dancing.

After this slow beginning, they quickly warmed up to the crowd and the crowd quickly warmed up to them. By the fourth song, the Low was delivering their typical high-energy performance, bleeding every ounce out of their down-to-earth thrash-rock.

The set was divided equally between material from Shakespeare My Butt and new material. The crowd sang along to old favorites such as "Eternal Fatalist" and "Bleed a Little While Tonight." The new songs, from an upcoming album, were well-received, especially the hard-edged "Pistol" and "Gambles."

The high point of the evening came with the final song, the immensely popular "Henry Needs A New Pair of Shoes," which transformed the stage and crowd alike into a flailing, singing mob.

The Low's independent CD, Shake-

We talked to everybody. (LSD) were the only ones who weren't knobs.

Three thousand copies of a special numbered edition of their new CD Hallucigenia will be available at their shows starting Nov. 13 ("for our real little harder."

The band was featured on Ear To The Ground this month and have just released their first video for "Eternal Fatalist." Also in the works for the Toronto four-piece is a possible Australian tour with Weddings, Parties, Anything.

With their schedule packed with touring, recording, filming and countless other projects, has this little indie band from Toronto finally earned some respect?

speare My Butt, has sold over 25,000 copies, one of the most successful indie releases in Canadian history. Based on that success, it is somewhat surprising that they decided to sign with a label. They've just recently signed with Vancouver's LSD Music.

When asked about their decision, guitarist and vocalist Ron Hawkins would only say, "It may sound like a cliché, but it's true: the music industry is a big scam.

fans," says Hawkins) with a national release scheduled for Jan. 13.

"Hallucigenia," explains road manager John Brooks with a grin, "is a kind of those fish that lives on the bottom of the ocean. You know — the lowest of the low."

Hawkins says the new album will be much stronger than Shakespeare, My Butt.

This Fudd's for U

by Jeff Zavitz
The Impant, University of Waterloo

Consider this. Elmer Fudd as mass man. White. Male. Crew cut. Alliterate. Gratuitous hunter. Homophobic. Balding. Unemployed. Dim-witted. Prone to stammering. Seeking to control nature. Out of touch with his inner self. Sexually repressed. Overweight. Obsessive. Violent. The man can't catch a rabbit. Worse yet, he won't stop trying.

Is the rabbit a metaphor for non-conformism? The imagery of an exponentially multiplying warren of bunnies, each doing their own thing, hopping uncontrollably in blatant disregard of any established order, must be quite terrifying to such a servant of the status quo.

Although such fears may be somewhat understandable, things are getting seriously out of hand. The intractable nature of this adversarial relationship seems to have become devoid of any causal raison d'être. This is aimless rage. Volatile testosterone without restraint or understanding. Unquestioned need to stamp out anything revolutionary or exploratory. Drone.

As a cartoon, this is cute, funny and seemingly harmless. It parades itself around as fictional and isolated. But as an army, bureaucracy or culture, the mindset becomes most disquieting.

Elmer Fudd runs the LAPD. Elmer Fudd is a Grand Dragon, KKK. Elmer Fudd loves the Super Bowl and always smiles while he beats his wife. Elmer Fudd calls war a "theatre" — he choreographed Desert Storm then rushed home to catch it on CNN. Fudd has Nintendo thumb.

Fudd pushed drugs, pulls strings and punches the clock. Fudd opposes immigration, censors high-school texts and knows right from wrong. Fudd makes policy and Fudd makes history. More importantly, Fudd makes more Fudd makes more Fudd makes more Fudd.

Fudd is the lowest common denominator. Upstanding citizen. Old boy. Immune. The Fudds are the ones who multiply like bunnies. They don't beat you with intelligence. They swamp you with numbers and homogenous intolerance.

Don't laugh rabbits, run for the hills. □

Intertext: Making paper obsolete

by Alex Bustos
Charlatan Staff

ason Snell is offering the future today.

A second-year masters student of journalism at Berkeley University in California, Snell is the editor of Intertext, a fiction magazine available only on the Internet, the international computer network of networks.

Like any kind of magazine, Intertext accepts unsolicited manuscripts, edits the work, and publishes what it considers the best stories. However, all transactions, from the sending of manuscripts to the sending of the magazine to subscribers, are done via e-mail (the "e" stands for electronic).

Three people run Intertext. There's Snell, assistant editor Jeff Duncan, an employee of a computer firm in Seattle, and Jeff Quan, an illustrator for the Oakland Tribune, does the cover art. Amazingly, Duncan and Snell have never met face to face, while Quan and Snell had their first and only meeting just recently.

So, one asks, how did the three meet and how do they work together?

Before Intertext, there was Athene, a non-genre magazine that published the stories of network users on e-mail. When the editor decided to stop doing the magazine, Snell contacted him via e-mail asking if he could continue the magazine under a different name. Soon after, Duncan e-mailed the editor of Athene, who told him about Snell. Quickly, an electronic correspondence between the two began. A cover artist joined, but was later replaced by Quan.

Once the group was formed, all work was done through e-mail. Copy editing was done by printing the file, editing on paper form, and then sending the corrected story via e-mail.

"I like editing," confesses Snell, the former editor-in-chief of The Guardian, the student paper at the University of California at San Diego.

"We are doing all we can do with the medium," he says, commenting on the magazine's venture in the emerging field of electronic publishing.

Snell told The Charlatan about some other electronic magazines, pointing out that Intertext is not the first magazine to appear on the net, the name used by computer users for the Internet.

In the mid-'80s, the now defunct magazine FSFnet (Fantasy Science-Fiction Network) was available on Bitnet (a computer network). Put out by the University of Maine, the magazine published science-fiction.

Following in this genre is Quanta. Published by Dan Applequist, who presently presides in Washington D.C., the magazine is readily available on the net.

The first issue of Intertext came out in March, 1991, with plans to publish bi-monthly. The second issue, however, came out July 2, 1991, but ever since the magazine has published every two months.

The latest issue came out on Sept. 15. Snell has high hopes for electronic publishing. When asked if electronic publishing will survive, Snell commented, "There are parts of the Internet which are going to go the way of the dinosaur... however, as for electronic publishing, no way."

The number of people who read Intertext is impossible to know. Snell has 1,200 individual subscribers, who ask to have it sent to their e-mail accounts directly instead of going through bulletin boards. However, Intertext is available through a variety of FTP sites (machines that store files which can be downloaded, FTP stands for File Transfer Protocol), bulletin board services and networks like Compuserve.

For example, I accessed Intertext on a bulletin board service that the National Capital Freenet has for electronic publications.

Hence, thousands of people have access to Intertext everyday.

"I was told," says Snell, "that for every one reader (on his subscription list) there are eight others."

Magazines like Intertext are a great way for aspiring writers to practise their craft and be read by thousands of readers.

Snell argues that even though Intertext doesn't pay its writers, it's sometimes better for someone to publish with Intertext or Quanta.

"Few magazines pay well," he says, adding it's very hard to get submissions accepted by mainstream magazines. Snell says Intertext publishes roughly 50 per cent of submissions and has a "reader on every single continent except Antarctica."

Computer networking is the way of the future. This is no longer a prediction but an established fact.

Magazines like Intertext and Quanta are pioneers in the field of electronic publishing. However, as electronic publishing becomes more commercial, magazines like Intertext could disappear.

Can a magazine who offers its readers a free source of entertainment survive up against a fancier Internet magazine that charge its customers a small price?

Perhaps. But the day of fancier Internet magazines has yet to come, and anyone with access to the Internet (an account, at no charge, with the National Capital Freenet allows access) can enjoy both Intertext and Quanta.

Intertext can be reached at FTP site network.ucsd.edu

The e-mail address of Jason Snell is jsnell@acf.berkeley.edu

Dan Applequist, Quanta editor, e-mail address is dan@porsche.visix.com

Posts on Intertext are made by Snell on alt.etext, alt.zines, and rec.mag. He also posts on newsgroups dealing with cyberpunks, Star Trek, and anything remotely relevant to the magazine. □

ON-CAMPUS RECRUITING PROGRAM

Employers from both the private and public sectors visit Carleton University to recruit graduating Carleton students interested in obtaining permanent employment at the end of the academic year. Positions sought through the On-Campus Recruitment Program are of a professional nature. Applying for positions involves the completion of an Application Employment Form (ACCIS) accompanied by a photocopy of the applicant's most recent Academic Transcript (not an Academic Audit) and a list of courses currently in progress. There are two application methods:

1. Pre-Screening: All applications must be submitted to Placement & Career Services, 508 UC, to be forwarded to the respective employers. Late applications will not be accepted. Employers pre-screen all applications and select a limited number of applicants for on-campus interviews. All students selected for an interview will be notified by the employer. It is the responsibility of the students selected for an interview to contact Placement & Career Services to arrange an interview time for the day(s) on which the employer will be interviewing.

2. Direct Sign Up: Some employers do not choose to pre-screen prior to their on-campus interviews. To arrange an interview with such an employer, it is necessary to visit the Centre and sign your name beside a time slot on the employer's interview schedule. At the time of sign-up a completed ACCIS form must be submitted. This application will be presented to the recruiter prior to your actual interview.

Fantasy, innovation and symbolism

Her Body doesn't fit her soul
National Arts Centre Theatre
Oct. 9

In this performance, Belgian choreographer/director Wim Vandekeybus has created some imaginative and incredible scenes.

Sometimes, though, creativity doesn't completely pay off, because too many conclusions about the show can be assumed and none may actually be in sync with the creator's concept.

Throughout the production, I kept trying to link the title to the show. Perhaps Vandekeybus meant that people are not being sensitive enough to what's not obvious and so he's handing the audience something that's unclear so people have to work at understanding it.

As best as I could figure, this production was about a blind woman trying to compensate for her lack of eyesight by journeying into a world of fantasy, which is where the show seemed to take place. The nine other dancers seemed to represent characters in her imagination.

Being blind, perhaps her body didn't fit her soul because she had aspirations and dreams that couldn't be fulfilled in the real world.

The only two things on the stage at the beginning of the show were two wires, one suspended over the other, from left to right.

When the blind woman walked onto the stage, she was stopped by the bottom rope. She turned around, sat down and began to watch a film on the big screen at the back of the stage (which is actually the short film Elba and Frederico, that Vandekeybus directed in 1993).

After this, the other dancers came on and acted out scenes from her subconscious.

All 10 dancers danced much more than they spoke. Even though they said little, one could determine their personalities by their actions. For instance, one male dancer with really short hair came across as innocent and strange. He said and did such odd things that he was contagiously funny.

At one point, he said, "One time, I had a pair of shoes on. One was black, and the other one brown. And this was pointed out to me by someone. I said, 'Yeah, I know, I have another pair at home.'"

There were also some amazing and bizarre scenes. Picture about five dancers suspended horizontally in the air, holding very still.

Later, these ropes were cut, and the dancers were freed.

Perhaps symbolic of the desire to just end it all, a woman came onto the stage with a bucket of water, placed it on the floor and dunked her head in it for several minutes. She was then "saved" by another dancer.

One actor even spoke to the audience exclusively in some Arabic language.

The rope that was present at the beginning of the show, that prohibited anyone from crossing it, was burned by all the dancers in the end.

Technically, the dancing was very creative and energetic, although they did not come across as sensual as they might have wanted.

Throughout the production, the audience was struck with bolts of fantasy, stark dark/light contrasts and subtle hints of a message. Music was playing in the background: bass, clarinet, horn, and drums.

The lights knew how to visually roar, and the music would change just as quickly as moods and fantasies do: from classical, to modernly instrumental, to jazz-like, which may have been too loud for a few members of the audience.

Her Body doesn't fit her soul was definitely different, wonderfully confusing (hopefully on purpose; I assume this was Vandekeybus's way to get us to think), and very entertaining.

At times, the show was very poetic and artistically reminiscent of Twin Peaks. It's too bad this performance was a one-timer. I would have enjoyed seeing it again, so that I could look for more details that could have clued me in as to what Vandekeybus himself actually intended.

Confusion bubbles through our thought channels.

Sky Cries Mary
A Return to the Inner Experience
World Domination

Sky Cries Mary is a band that doesn't fit into any of the conventional music categories. It definitely breaks free from the recycled grunge-rock stereotype attached to most other bands hailing out of Seattle.

A Return To The Inner Experience, their newest release, transports the listener to an elevated plane of musical awareness.

The seven-member band draws its musical inspiration from every type of musical background imaginable, from industrial, rock and pop to jazz, classical and even country.

The first track off of the album is an instrumental piece entitled "Walla Walla." The song is soothing and uplifting, setting the mood for the rest of the album.

The musical trip continues with "Moving Like Water," a psychedelic mosaic of musical tones and colors. Sky Cries Mary manages to tap into a spiritual pool that runs deep with hypnotic rhythms and melodies. The lyrics are refreshingly positive, rejoicing in the power of the human mind and spirit.

It's nice to find an alternative band true to the sense of the word. They are attempting something totally new and original, ignoring the formula for success that is currently spreading like the plague throughout the music industry.

Sky Cries Mary is a band that should definitely be checked out by anyone looking for something new and original. This is an experience on the leading edge of trippy, New Age, spiritually based music.

The Tear Garden
Sheila Liked the Rodeo
Netwerk

Sheila Liked the Rodeo would like to come off as a psychedelic-electronic hybrid by a couple of tortured artists.

Unfortunately, the end result suggests members of the Tear Garden are neither tortured enough nor terribly artistic.

Rather, the album comes across as a poor cousin of the band MC 900 Foot Jesus' Welcome to My Dream, which is itself a bit of a yawner.

The Tear Garden seems to strive for some sort of deconstructionist machine-driven musical ideal. But the band is either not trying that hard, or else is not very good at it — what we end up with sounds like a couple of guys goofing off with a mixer, a sampler and a multi-track tape deck.

This has been done a lot better, by artists as diverse as the Beatles, De La Soul and B.A.D. II.

This murky, overwrought effort is a waste of time.

The Charlatan Pub Crawl Extravaganza Manx Magnificence!

by Mo Gannon
Charlatan Staff

actually got to sit down at the Manx Pub the other night. That's a big deal, you know. Most nights, you have to squeeze in with a merry bunch of mainly regular Manxgoers, who seem quite content to stand hip to hip.

Perhaps that's because they know this pub is a very, very good thing. After passing by the all-dressed-up-and-nothing-to-do-but-cruise in the other bar lineups on Elgin, the Manx is like coming home.

Reminiscent of the days of gas streetlamps and leather-bound books, the small, dimly-lit salon with red plush couches and hammered-copper tables lies unpretentiously low a few steps under the Elgin sidewalk.

The pub's unpretentious atmosphere seems to brush off on the staff and its patrons — or maybe it's the other way around. Regardless, it's as clear as a flat gin and tonic that no one is there to do anything but make good conversation over a drink or two.

That's sort of what owners Chris Swail, David Dorey, Marcia Lea and John Archibald had in mind when they came up with the idea for the Manx.

"It's almost like a community centre," says Lea. "It's not just a place to drink. It's a place to meet people."

Among the odd but comfortable mix of sweatshirts and second-hand clothing, it's pretty hard to pick out the staff because they're apt to sit down at a table to chat as they make their rounds.

"The people that are regulars here become your friends," Swail says. "There is a definite appreciation between us and the staff and the people who come in."

Another good thing about this place is the lack of obnoxious boozers bent on ruining your good time. Swail, who is intent on maintaining a safe and non-confrontational atmosphere in the pub, makes it known that no one welcomes buttheads at the Manx.

Otherwise, the doors are open. "I think anyone who comes in would feel comfortable," he says.

Swail says he appreciates the amount of faith people have invested in the pub by coming back over and over, and that makes him want to give them more.

That's why if someone wants another name added to the list of 34 scotches, he'll do his damndest to get it. Giving people some input into the pub makes them feel at home.

"This place grows with them," Swail says. "They feel like they're part of the wealth behind this pub."

Swail is also part of that wealth and thankful for it. Whether he ever gets to sleep is the question. When the 23-year-old Carleton student is not working at the Manx or going to school, he's fronting the local band Fun for Malakai.

Swail hooked up with Lea and Dorey when they were all working at the Mayflower, a restaurant and pub down the road. The idea came up in December and they found the location to lease a month later.

"We just got together and figured through all of our experiences we could probably run a pub," says Dorey.

From there, they got together investors amongst their friends and families and kicked in shares themselves. For 20-hour days over three weeks, about 30 friends volunteered their time to renovate the place and have it ready for its opening April 14.

Manx, an old Celtic language spoken in the Isle of Man, was chosen to reflect the Celtic character of the pub, while avoiding any stereotypical references to St. Patrick, harps and shamrocks.

"The genesis of the pub tradition has come from Celtic countries," Lea explains.

While the owners had budgeted at first for the Manx to survive, that's no longer a worry. "We've overshoot tremendously," says Dorey.

The owners say they're committed to the place for at least five years — the length of the first lease — although they'd like to see it stick around for longer.

"I'd like to see this place become sort of a positive institution," says Swail.

None of the owners are too keen to actively promote the place, because they believe in the power of word of mouth and the strength of the pub's reputation to travel that way.

Watson a no-show at BOG

by John Steinbachs
Charlatan Staff

The president of the Carleton University Students' Association has failed to attend any board of governors' meetings or events since September.

Lucy Watson was elected as a board governor student representative last February.

Watson's term as a board member began July 1. Since then, she has failed to attend a board orientation meeting on Oct. 13, a board of governors' meeting on Sept. 29, a board of governors' retreat on Oct. 18, a board finance committee meeting Sept. 22 and a board reception for new members which followed the Sept. 29 meeting.

Watson says even though she didn't attend the meetings she has kept in touch with the other board members.

"Although to this date my attendance record has not been stellar, I certainly have been involved," says Watson.

Watson says she was unable to attend the monthly board meeting, the board reception and the finance committee meeting because she has a class on Wednesday afternoons.

She says she missed the Oct. 13 orientation because of National Student Day and couldn't attend the Oct. 18 retreat due to "internal problems" of a staff-related nature.

The board of governors is comprised of university administration officials, community representatives, business people and Carleton students. There are three student seats out of 33. The board votes on issues which directly influence the university and students, such as tuition hikes.

Watson says she had to take the course on the same day as the board meetings because she needs it to finish her degree and it's only offered on Wednesdays, but says she has spoken to her professor and will now attend the meetings.

Watson says she is unhappy that the board is not very accommodating to people who are trying to balance their studies.

Board meetings were set for Wednesdays last June, says Charles Watt, secretary to the board of governors. He says all members of the board were notified of the change through a letter from his office which was mailed at the beginning of July.

Watt says all board members are notified one week before the meetings by a phone call from his office. He says this is done to ensure the board has quorum.

Jim Watson, Ottawa city councillor for Capital Ward, also cannot attend the Wednesday meetings because he has regional council meetings at the same time.

Elaine Silver, who occupies another student seat on the board, says she received a notice on July 5 that the board and committee meetings would be held on Wednesdays.

Silver says she has been to all the board meetings and events. She says she found the retreat and the orientation an "invaluable experience" because she was able to meet the other board members and understand how they feel about certain issues.

She says the orientation allowed her to understand her role as a board member. "It's difficult to take over a task with a history and you don't know the history," says Silver. □

Students upset over tunnel locker removal

by Tonya Zelinsky
Charlatan Staff

Do you have a lot of books to carry around with you this year? Thinking of getting a locker? Well, get in line.

This summer 1,623 lockers were removed in response to a 1972 report and "due to the growing number of students," says Stan Britton, manager of construction services, which leaves 3,633 in total. Of those lockers, 765 were in the quad area around Dunton Tower and the library.

When the lockers were removed, however, the parking and lockers department received about 160 complaints, says Pat Barker, a member of the clerical staff for Carleton's parking and lockers office. She says many students were unable to get a locker in the area they wanted.

Tara Wagg, a second-year linguistics student, is upset by the locker removal. "I can tell you that last year I had a locker near the library and it was very convenient for me. Now it's by the Unicentre which is inconvenient," says Wagg.

Liza Castro, a second-year political science student, says she was upset about the changes.

"Last year I didn't really need one (a locker). But this year rolled around and I have about a thousand books and all my teaching assistants are in Dunton Tower. When I went to the business office, they just didn't have any lockers available for me or in the area I wanted."

There are still about 100 lockers available in the tunnels under the Mackenzie Building.

In 1972, a report made by the university traffic consultants "strongly recommended" that all lockers in the tunnel between the library and Southam Hall be removed. The year is now 1993 and the changes have been made. Britton wasn't sure why the report was first made in 1972.

"It had to do with two things. The halls were already congested; there was that safety aspect. There was a safety alarm raised by the (university traffic) committee, so a report was made," he says.

Barker says the parking and lockers office was told by construction services the renovations were "for safety and fire regulations." With the growing number of students and vehicles using the tunnels, lockers had to be removed to widen the space, she says.

She says the locker situation "didn't look good. People were complaining it was crowded. There were so many people in the area that it was congested."

Less lockers mean more room for traffic.

removals, which began a week later.

The office was left with little notice because mid-August was the most convenient time to fit in the work, says Tom Novosedlik, coordinator of construction services. He says the goal was to have the work done for September.

"The tunnels are used for people going back and forth, and the width has to be maintained.

Other vehicles there are travelling around all the time. It's far too congested."

Students were not notified by construction services about the renovations. Novosedlik says because it was summertime there was "no need to notify students. The lockers removed were not in use." Students attending school during the summer used one block of lockers which was not touched until the end, says Novosedlik.

The parking and lockers office did not notify students of the changes either.

"We were in charge of selling lockers," says Barker. She says the department wasn't responsible for informing students about the changes.

Britton could not determine the cost of removing the lockers. He says the money for locker removals came from the Dunton Tower elevator restoration project and the library elevator construction project.

Renovations on the entrances to the tunnels between Dunton Tower and the library were made to provide an elevator which will improve the accessibility of the library, says Britton. □

No contested seats in NUG election

by Mario Carlucci and Matt Skinner
Charlatan Staff

Twenty-seven candidates were acclaimed as New University Government representatives in an election held Oct. 5 and 6.

Since none of the seats were contested, the candidates automatically claimed their seats without students' votes.

The 27 students represent 15 per cent of the available NUG positions. There were about 180 positions available, says Gary Anandasangaree, the NUG caucus chair.

NUG representatives sit on university department boards and committees as voting members on academic decisions made by those bodies. In the past, these academic decisions have dealt with the curriculum, class size and the use of instructional television.

"There are quite a number of vacant positions," says Anandasangaree, who is also director of academics for the Carleton University Students' Association.

"Law, public administration, mass communication, film, computer science — just to name a few — have seats available to be filled," says Anandasangaree.

Ron Saunders, chair of the department of law, says he's not surprised that only 27 students applied. He says law students weren't told of the upcoming NUG election in classes because no one from NUG told him when they were going to be held.

Saunders says he wasn't made aware of the NUG election until he was approached about it by a Charlatan reporter a week after they were held.

Paul Attallah, associate director for the school of journalism and communication, says he wasn't notified of the election.

"In previous years there has been a very similar outcome," says Senthoooran

Sridas, the deputy NUG chair. "Beyond the election process, whatever seats were empty, we'd just write to the department and the faculty would announce it (to the students) at the lectures," he says.

"One of the things NUG has to do this year is get more people involved, build more enthusiasm for NUG, and it's something all NUG reps can play an effective role in," says Anandasangaree.

CUSA to hire new safety commissioner

by Tanya Workman
Charlatan Staff

After six months of operating without a safety commissioner, the Carleton University Students' Association has finally decided to hire one.

The new commissioner will work 10-15 hours a week and will be in charge of conducting campus safety audits, talking to students about safety issues, sitting on safety committees and lobbying administration to improve conditions on campus, says CUSA finance commissioner René Faucher.

Since May, CUSA President Lucy Watson has been responsible for the safety commissioner's duties. She announced Oct. 18 at a council meeting that a safety commissioner will be hired during the first week of November. She said the reason for the delay in hiring for the position was that she was busy in September and "the month just disappeared."

The announcement was made shortly after Kristin Russel, a councillor for the Graduate Students' Association, complained to CUSA council about the lack of concern she felt it had towards campus safety.

Russel is the GSA representative on the presidential advisory committee on personal safety, and there is a place for CUSA. Russel says she was disappointed no one from CUSA attended the committee's last meeting Oct. 14. Watson was supposed to attend, but says she was unable to because of her involvement in hiring for Oliver's pub.

Russel says she met with Watson a couple of weeks before the committee meeting and told her she was not impressed with CUSA's involvement in safety issues.

At that time, CUSA still had not made plans to hire a safety commissioner. Faucher says it was up to Watson to decide if she wanted to hire one.

"What we did this year was that we made plans so that in the event that Lucy wanted a part-time safety commissioner during the school year... we have funds put aside to hire someone and pay for their wages."

Last year, safety commissioner Samantha Sheen had her own portfolio in the CUSA budget. This means she had a budget of more than $20,000 for expenses like office supplies and safety flyers, including $8,800 for her salary.

The new commissioner is expected to earn between $3,500 and $3,800. This is considerably less than what Sheen earned, because she also worked full-time in the summer before the 1992-93 school year. The new commissioner's term will run until the end of the academic year.

Faucher says when he was preparing the budget in the summer, he wasn't sure whether CUSA would be hiring a commissioner and so a portfolio was not necessary.

Watson says there was never a question of whether a commissioner would be hired and that she had been planning for one all along.

The money for the commissioner's salary will be coming out of CUSA's discretionary fund, which is used for "anything that comes up that wasn't planned," Faucher says.

The fund, in the operating budget, is budgeted at $39,565 and Faucher says it hasn't been dipped into yet. He says he doesn't anticipate more than $1,000 in office expenses for this year's safety commissioner.

Watson's involvement in safety issues was one reason a full portfolio was not needed, says Faucher. "Safety has been one of her priorities over the last couple of years. So she wanted to deal with a lot of the issues herself."

Russel says she wants CUSA to lobby university administrators to improve conditions on campus so they are safer for students at night.

"I expect to have emergency phones on campus... There are no emergency phones; there's minimal lighting."

The presidential advisory committee would like to have outdoor emergency phones and well-lit designated walkways across campus, but they only have $30,000 to do this with. Phones cost $6,000 each, says Nancy Adamson, co-chair of the committee, and special lighting costs over $12,000 per light.

"I want to get some sort of support from the undergraduate students that yes, this is an issue and we're not going to let it die, because it's far from finished now," says Russel.

Woman assaulted in library

by Mario Carlucci
Charlatan Staff

A man assaulted a woman while she was studying on the third floor of the library on Sunday, Oct. 17.

The woman was studying at a desk on the third level of the library at about 4:30 p.m. when she had her feet and lower leg touched repeatedly by a man from under her desk.

The man is described as a Caucasian of regular build and six feet tall. He has blue eyes and short, curly grey hair, a moustache and is over 40 years old.

A safety poster was circulated about the incident on Tuesday, Oct. 19.

SECURITY BRIEFS

While the incident occurred off campus, Boudreault says many students use the walkway along Colonel By to the Heron Road bridge.

A safety poster was circulated about the incident on Friday, Oct. 15.

"(The notice) is up there because of the concern for the students," says Boudreault. The matter was turned over to the Ottawa Police.

Campus car thefts up for October

Car thefts are increasing on campus, says Len Boudreault, assistant director of the department of university safety.

"I haven't seen any (car thefts) since I came in here in January," says Boudreault, but "there have been car thefts recently."

He says he doesn't think there is a professional theft ring operating on campus, but says thefts have happened in the parking garage near the administration building.

Boudreault says some precautions can help prevent car thefts:

- Keep your car locked at all times.
- Lock all valuables in the trunk.
- Report any suspicious-looking people to the department of university safety at 788-3612.

Man exposes himself on Heron Road Bridge

A man indecently exposed himself to a female student walking alone along Colonel By Drive at around 7:30 p.m. on Tuesday, Oct. 12.

The woman noticed the man on the stairs of the Heron Road Bridge.

"It was at a distance as I recall (from the report). She was in no danger," says Len Boudreault, assistant director of the department of university safety.

The man is described as a slim, English-speaking Caucasian, with long grey hair and balding. He is believed to be in his late forties and between 5 feet seven inches and 5 feet 10 inches.

But the past few years haven't been stellar, he says.

"Traditionally, the response for NUG hasn't been enormous. In my three years here, there have only been two seats contested in NUG elections. That was in journalism and political science (two years ago)," says Anadasangaree.

"I think for one thing, a lot of students don't know what NUG reps can do. And a lot of people are sceptical," he says. "Some people may feel intimidated by that process of working with people who may mark you in the future."

He says the students represent 15 per cent of the votes in each department, with faculty representing the other 85 per cent.

Sridas says he thinks if all the NUG positions were filled and the students represented the full 15 per cent of their voting power, they would have a good chance of raising issues that are important to students. He says with just a fraction of the 180 seats filled, this won't be possible.

"When the student representation goes down, the voice of the students is not loud enough," Sridas says.

Anadasangaree says he can now appoint students as NUG representatives, if they are interested.

Sridas says about nine students have volunteered since the election. "It's an ongoing process," he says. "We expect the number (of student reps) to come up to at least 75."

Michel Gaulin, clerk of the university senate, says the poor turn out for NUG is indicative of student priorities.

"I think students right now are preoccupied with a number of things—the economic situation, combination of studies and work, and they're preoccupied about jobs," he says.

"The work of the university continues and academic decisions are being made," says Gaulin. He says student input isn't restricted to NUG alone. "The leadership of CUSA and GSA provide input as well."

Native elder shares wisdom and wit

by Naomi Bock
Charlatan Staff

Wilfred Peltier sat silent and blinking beneath a Stetson hat covered in eagle pins and feathers.

The room was filled with about 30 people sipping tea and waiting for his talk on education and traditional knowledges to begin, at the Oct. 15 session of the "Tea and Cultural Studies" series.

Taking off his hat and glasses, he pulled a braid of sweetgrass out of a plastic bag and lit it. The room fell silent, mesmerized, as he touched his braided hair and the back of his head, shaking the grass until the sweet, smoky smell filled the room. He explained that it is used in Native ceremonies for spiritual purification. Then he paused.

"I'm not comfortable. And I'm not comfortable because people are sitting behind me." The room was rearranged so all could see.

Peltier, Carleton's Native elder-in-residence, began to talk about his early life on Manitoulin Island, when he was given "a sentence for school" and taken from "the fields with the birds and animals," where he said the real learning is.

"Learning is as old as life; there's nothing new about it."

He talked about the knowledge of nature, the instincts of the plants and animals. "A tree knows how to grow. It knows when to put on leaves and when not to . . . We're the only ones that are messed up."

The Native way of learning is by experiencing and discovering the world around you, said Peltier. "I learned by touch, by hearing, from all that flowed from within me." In school, Peltier said, "everything was discovered for me."

"Our education is for survival. (Mainstream education) is in the hands of those totally ignorant of survival. Everything there is to know in this world every one of you already knows; you just have to experience it. That, too, I know."

Peltier said he saw a sign in the university aimed at Native people that read, "Discover who you are — stay in school." He exclaimed, "My God, that's where you lose your identity — in an institution!"

Peltier talked about the misguided nature of modern self-discovery. "Most people I know are trying to discover who they are by a process of becoming, by naming some category." He said universities encourage this because students work toward a goal or occupation with their studies.

Peltier said people's connection with nature is lost, and this loss will destroy us. "As you lose your relationship with the land because you're trying to become something, you're going to destroy yourself, and take us along with you."

Peltier talked ironically about the misconceptions of a society that believes Native peoples are poor. "Maybe we're struggling to find something to eat, but all these people trying to get a million dollars and then they're not satisfied — they want two. That's poverty."

People today are run by time, said Peltier. "There is no more time of the seasons, no more time of wild strawberries, of the ducks or the moose."

Peltier said technology is dangerous. "We're all at odds, caught up in a big machine we've built . . . We've got that monster running loose, a technological monster."

Peltier recounted one of his stories, called "The Board and the Mountain."

He once went up to a mountain with a friend. It was a beautiful moment, amidst the poplars with the song of meadowlarks in the air. His friend asked him what changes he would make if he had the power. Peltier looked up and saw a distant cloud. He said maybe he'd bring half the cloud closer, but decided it was perfect where it was.

Then he listened to the meadowlarks, and thought of making more of them, but again decided there were just enough. Then he looked down and saw a board that had been pushed aside. He decided to move it back where it had been.

Peltier reached down and picked up the board, and to his surprise, millions of insects angrily squirmed at his action.

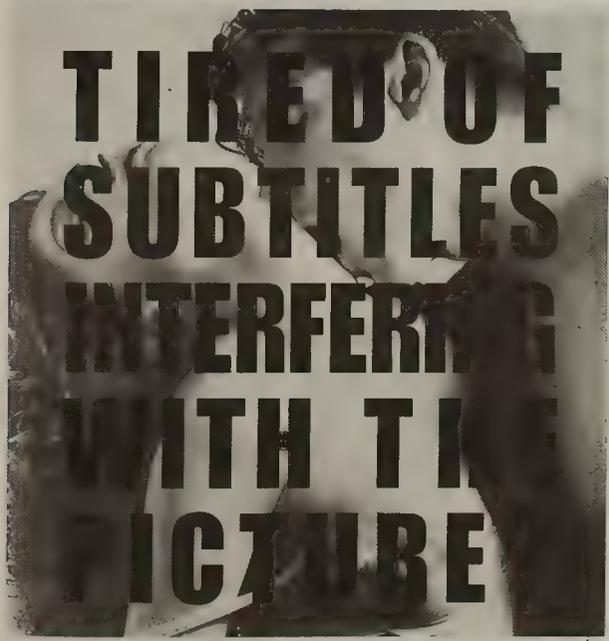

"I was stunned. I had lifted the cap off the world with good intentions. All those people who came into our reserves lifted the cap off the world with good intentions. They said we had no recreation, so they gave us games so we could fight each other. And not any one of them know what they're doing."

Peltier said sharing within Native communities has given way to competition and suspicion which didn't exist in the past.

"We had no lists but everything got done anyway. We didn't have what they have now — stress, I think they call it."

Peltier said our society needs more openness. He once heard another Native man say, "The pine grows with the birch, the birch with the elm, so all are welcome in my lodge. Trees don't discriminate, so how can I?"

Part of the problem is the nature of language, said Peltier. "Words separate. What is the spoken language for? For the sake of control." Peltier laughed. "That's what I've been doing, so I better shut up. I was going to tell you about my teeth but I won't." □

Alan Shain challenges societal barriers

by Angie Gallop
Charlatan Staff

Alan Shain has spent his life challenging barriers.

At 25, he is a Carleton political science/sociology graduate. Besides his job at Statistics Canada, he is a comedian and a poet. He has been doing comedy for four years now, working regularly for the past two years, often doing opening spots at Yuk Yuk's.

Shain has had cerebral palsy since he was injured at birth. He uses either a walker or a motorized scooter to get around and his speech is impaired, causing what he calls his "funny accent."

Shain has been using comedy to break the ice and teach people who do not share his condition about the needs and feelings of the disabled community.

"My accent scares people away and at times I might be ignored or people assume I can't understand before they even try," he says. "I often have to deal with this mindset more than my heavy accent."

He describes himself as "someone who wants to do it all." He has just been selected to go to Costa Rica to work on development projects with the Youth Challenge International Program. Past Youth Challenge International projects have included building bridges and roads.

Although Youth Challenge has had a deaf woman participate, Shain is the first participant to have a mobility disability.

Grant Hogg, youth director of the program, says he was first in touch with Shain through a past participant, Mike Gifford. Hogg says Shain became interested during one of Gifford's presentations on his experiences in Guyana.

Since then Hogg says he's talked with Shain about the program opening its doors to the physically disabled.

"One reason for going was to promote some disability awareness among development projects because people with disabilities get left out," says Shain. "So I want to see if I can perhaps change some attitudes within the communities I will be working in."

Shain says one of his main concerns is that all too often people with disabilities in developing countries are hidden away.

"We are very much an invisible group, partly because things are inaccessible so we can't get around, but also because of religious or community beliefs," he says.

Shain says in a lot of cultures, a disability is seen as a punishment to the family, so often children and older family members with disabilities are hidden away to escape ostracism.

"The experience of poverty and lack of education and lack of employment is greatly enhanced by the experience of disability," he says. "Even the United Nations considers people with disabilities the most impoverished and exploited social group in the world."

Because Youth Challenge is a very physically strenuous program, Shain must work hard to make the experience positive.

"It takes a lot of effort on both sides," says Gifford. "Al doesn't know exactly what to expect and Youth Challenge doesn't have a lot of experience in accommodating disabilities, so it will be a good experience for both."

Hogg says he hopes Shain will determine if Youth Challenge is able to accommodate mobility-disabled workers and how to adjust the program. He says both sides are aware of the possibility that Youth Challenge might not be able to accommodate the needs of workers with disabilities.

"I am interested and excited about the potential but we must take it one step at a time," Hogg says.

Shain says he will have to make his group aware that he will need their support.

"I walk with a walker right now so that means I am slower than average," he says. "Also the terrain will be a problem and so I will need physical support from the group to help me get around the worksite or the community."

But Shain will need more than physical support.

"Not to say the project itself will be a negative experience, but until the community gets used to me they might seclude me, not speak to me, speak over my head or ignore me when I speak to them," he says.

"So I'll need my fellow crew members to say 'Hey, did you hear what he said?' when this happens."

Hogg says although Shain may pose different challenges for his group, group members must work together to accommodate individual differences.

"When someone (who does not have a mobility disability) twists an ankle, the team must work together to make sure that person makes it to the next site," he says. "Because he has a strong spirit, (Shain) will be a great role model for both his co-workers and the people in the community."

Gifford says he hopes Shain's experience will encourage other people with disabilities to participate in things like Youth Challenge International.

"It's about time they are included in these experiences, like everyone else," he says. "Hopefully this will be a good start."

Despite the obstacles Shain must overcome, he is confident because of his successes in Canada in bridging the barriers he faces.

"It's interesting because people quickly find out that it doesn't take long to get used to the way I speak," he says. "Some people come up to me and say 'Hey Al! You know, I think you're really improving!' And I say 'You know it's not me that's improving, it's you!'"

Shain's poem, "The girl with the blanket," describes the frustration he sometimes feels because of his disability.

"sometimes i cannot deal with it (my Cerebral Palsy) and i need to go somewhere where it will not follow"

Although he cannot change his reality, he is accommodating it and not let-

Innu camp on the Hill to protest policy

by Prema Oza
Charlatan staff

Despite cold weather and an even colder initial reception from the federal government, about 50 men, women and children from the Innu community in New Davis Inlet and Sheshatshui in Labrador set up camp on Parliament Hill from Oct. 5-10.

But despite finally meeting with officials from the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs, the Innu's plight is far from resolved.

The main event of the protest was a rally on the third day, Oct. 7, where many native leaders spoke out against the government. Among the speakers at the rally were Assembly of First Nations representatives, political candidates and Ron George, the president of the Native Council of Canada.

The Innu protest was to draw attention to the inhumane conditions they have been forced to live in since being relocated from Old Davis Inlet to New Davis Inlet by the federal government in 1967.

"The issue is colonization. We feel that we have a responsibility to ourselves to deal with our own issues and our own problems," said Innu nation president Peter Penashue.

The Innu also say the government has not fulfilled its promises to address issues like unfit housing, improper heating conditions, poor health conditions, social decay and a lack of job opportunities in the New Davis Inlet settlement in Newfoundland.

According to a report on the complaints by the Innu of Labrador to the Canadian Human Rights Commission released in August, these promises have not been kept.

Peter Peshanue addresses the rally on Parliament Hill.

The report says poor housing and service conditions led to a decline in the social structure of the Innu community. The Innu say this was "discrimination" and a violation of their human rights.

They say they wish to relocate to Little Sango Bay on the mainland of Labrador. Despite initial approval by the federal government, the re-settlement has not yet gone ahead.

Indian and Northern Affairs says it is studying the site's water resources and possible job opportunities to assess whether or not the area is a good alternative for re-settlement. Those who support the Innu, however, feel the group's requests are being ignored by the federal and Newfoundland governments.

"Clyde Wells and his Liberal government in Newfoundland want to tell the Innu where to go. I'd like to tell Clyde Wells where to go. Maybe he could try living at Davis Inlet," said Cindy Moriarty, a candidate from the NDP in the Carleton-Gloucester riding who addressed the rally.

Above all is the long-standing debate over both the federal and provincial government's desire to have the Innu registered as Status Indians under the Indian Act. The government says the Innu must register to receive social benefits under the act.

As well, the government says the Innu must register out of fairness to other Aboriginal groups who are already registered. But the Innu maintain that they have the right to self-government.

"We want a process where we can start dealing by a bilateral process with the federal government and the federal government has said that we have to go under the Indian Act," says Peshanue.

"Any kind of a system based on whether you have a number or not, any kind of a system that will only give you rights if you subjugate your sovereignty to them, can be called nothing other than an apartheid government," said George at the rally.

"Apartheid is alive and well in Canada and... they are trying to get the Innu to subjugate themselves under the Indian Act, which everybody knows is archaic and has to be dismantled. It has to be replaced by the inherent right to self government... Give us the self-determination we deserve."

On Oct. 10, a representative of Indian and Northern Affairs met with the Innu. The next day, the Innu left the Hill.

"It is my understanding that the Innu would not have left unless their original proposal was looked at," said Karen Issac, media relations spokesperson for the Assembly of First Nations. "They must have received some assurances that their file would be given the priority that it deserves."

According to an Indian and Northern Affairs spokesperson, the government assured the Innu that it would give their concerns priority and promised funds to help them.

"One portion of the money is to go to study registration under the Indian Act," said Toni Bramley, the deputy director of communications for the department. "The other portion is to go to (the study of) social issues. Now it is up to them."

Bramley did not disclose the exact amount of money given by the government.

At the rally, Elizabeth Penashue, an elderly member of the Innu community, summed up the Innu's sentiment.

"Our struggle is not for ourselves, it is for all our people, all the children who will be born years from now. It is for their health and their well-being." □

Harb is the invisible candidate on CU campus

by Jodi McKenzie
Charlatan Staff

Although Mac Harb says he has been supportive of student issues as the Liberal Member of Parliament for Ottawa Centre, Carleton students seem oblivious to his efforts.

And for a candidate who lost all four residence polls in the 1988 election, that can't be good news.

Harb, who is running for re-election, says he has been very active in promoting student issues during his term.

"I have done a good job for students," Harb says. It was due to his influence, he says, that the Liberal Party adopted national policies to set up apprenticeship programs and promote literacy that were unveiled in this election.

Harb introduced three private member's bills to Parliament regarding education and literacy during his term. A private member's bill is proposed legislation submitted to the House of Commons by an MP who is not acting on behalf of a party.

Harb introduced a bill on educational standards in June 1991, but it did not get past its first reading because the House of Commons went on its summer break. Bill C-318 sought to "achieve access to quality education for all Canadians," says Harb.

At the time, Harb told The Charlatan he wanted to establish national standards for all levels of education because of the high dropout rate in Canadian universities. He said the standards would ensure everyone had an equal opportunity to get a quality education.

Harb's second private member's bill sought to ensure that federal transfer payments to the provinces for health and post-secondary education are used for those specific purposes. Although Bill C-426 also failed to become law, Harb says he will propose it again.

"The government should not give the money if it is not going to be used for education properly," says Harb.

Bill C-435, another of Harb's bills which also did not pass, would have set standards for national literacy.

Despite these efforts, many students in his own riding do not recognize him as someone who has done a lot for them since his election.

The great majority of the Carleton students who talked to The Charlatan had no idea who Harb was. Those who did had no idea what he had done for them.

One student who did know something about Harb's performance was sympathetic.

"If (the Liberals) weren't in opposition he might get (his bills) through," said Mike Tobson, a third-year history student. Although he says he's not a supporter, he says he "has no problem with Harb."

As well as his work in Parliament, Harb says he has worked with the Canadian Federation of Students for some time.

Harb "has not been extremely closely linked" with the federation, says Jocelyn

National Student Day flops again this year

by Carolyn McBain
Charlatan Staff

The Carleton University Students' Association invested about $500 in National Student Day, but the student interest rate was extremely low at the Oct. 13 rally on Parliament Hill.

Less than 20 Carleton students joined students from the University of Ottawa at the annual event to protest issues such as increasing tuition fees and cuts to student loans. Only about 31 students in total appeared at the rally.

CUSA rented two buses to take students from campus to the Hill, but the second bus was turned away due to the poor turnout.

Kristine Haselsteiner, CUSA's vice-president external, organized the event.

She says the students' association expected a larger turnout.

"Students kept saying they were coming," she says.

Last year, only the seven organizers showed up to board the three buses chartered to take students to the rally. The trip to the rally was cancelled and CUSA was left with a $170 bill for the bus rentals. Kim Newton, then-vice-president external, blamed the poor showing on poor promotion of the rally.

This year, CUSA advertised the rally in The Charlatan in addition to posters and leaflets distributed in residence. Members of the CUSA executive also spoke to several classes, encouraging them to attend the rally.

Gary Anandasangaree, director of Charron, CFS communications director, but he has been "constant" in regard to student issues.

Harb has worked with the CFS to develop programs for student apprenticeship training and literacy. Charron also says Harb "has been active among the Liberals on student issues."

Harb says education is in his campaign platform now, as it was in 1988.

Harb says students should support him in the upcoming election because he "plans to continue to stand up for student issues and concerns."

But he seems to have failed to make himself visible to many students here at Carleton. □ academics for CUSA, says he believes students wanted to come but they were too busy.

"A lot of people didn't come because they have part-time jobs. It's not because they're not interested."

President Lucy Watson agrees. "Students have to make choices — work, school or attending the rally. A lot of students are busy with work and school," she says.

Haselsteiner has a different theory. "Students don't think their voice really matters," she says. "We need to motivate them."

She says she hasn't come up with any ideas on how to accomplish this yet.

"But I'd love to hear from someone who has..." □

VIEWPOINT

Election TV ads: the slick and the silly

by Eric Langenbacher

Every four years or so, Canada's boring and uneventful national image is shattered.

The occasion is the federal election campaign and the deluge of political advertisements that accompany it.

This time around, the ads run the whole gamut of styles, from the slick Madison Avenue type to the amateur CJOH type.

In case you didn't have time to watch the tube, I spent hours psychotically switching channels in order to catch all the ads. Hopefully this effort will help you decide who to vote for.

Progressive Conservative — PC ads are as slick, commercialized and vicious as in the past. Most of them have stressed the leadership factor of the Prime Minister, Kim! Campbell.

Tory viciousness has also surfaced, most notably in the brouhaha surrounding the anti-Chrétien spots. Actually, these two ads are my favorite Tory ones. Some very unflattering mugs of Chrétien were shown with voices questioning his leadership abilities. The ads ended with the question, "Jean Chrétien for Prime Minister?" and the slogan "Think Twice."

I give this ad an A+. It was concise and to the point. Sure, it could be viewed as vicious, but, let's face it, Chrétien is not the most photogenic candidate who has ever run.

I also give the Liberals credit for seizing this opportunity and creating a pseudo-event for the media. Chrétien's remark, "God gave me this defect," was the chance politicians and media types dream of.

The most fascinating aspect of the event is the Liberals have used Chrétien's "look" in their own ads for him in his riding of St. Maurice with a slogan to the effect of "funny face, but good policies." How quickly we forget.

Most of the Tories' ads, however, simply show Campbell talking. New images of the PM are portrayed: the slick businesswoman with her KC pin has passed and lately a haggard au naturel Campbell image has dominated. The sheer number of Tory commercials attest to the their increasing desperation in the face of unflattering polls.

Liberals — The Liberals know they're winning and their ads show it. Well, they've had almost a decade out of power to work on them. Most of their ads have a very patronizing, almost magisterial tone to them, as if they have already formed a government.

But the ads send out conflicting signals, as the commercials themselves mirror Chrétien's folksy style (although there is subject/verb agreement, unlike his speeches) and the issue the Liberals find important: jobs. The Crips stress their plan incessantly, devoting whole commercials to it.

But several of the ads are set in a palatial, older home with satin curtains and hardwood floors. Is this the image the "man of the people" wants to convey?

The Liberals' best ad is in black and white and has some sort of inspirational elevator music. Young and sullen faces presumably show the effects of Tory policy and the simple slogan "Give 'em back their dignity" merits an A.

New Democratic Party — Is the NDP a political force anymore? The polls say they are not, but their commercials are actually the most professional.

Audrey McLaughlin's little talk in the hospital waiting room about medicare reveals one of two major NDP themes. The other, free trade, attacks the Liberals' position. Both spots end with a slick Zorro-like X and, then, boom! — NDP.

I found these commercials well-engineered and concise. But perhaps these ads show what the electorate already know: the NDP is just not "with it," as they have not chosen issues that are central to voters in this election.

Reform — Preston Manning is portrayed as a beaming leader with victorious fist raised high in triumph. Any similarities with certain rightist self-promotion in the past, or with the Bloc Québécois?

My favorite Reform ad was the supermarket check-out one, with all the Tories' financial mistakes being tallied, adding up to an oversized grocery bill for Canadians. A.

Finally, here's the best and worst commercials of all.

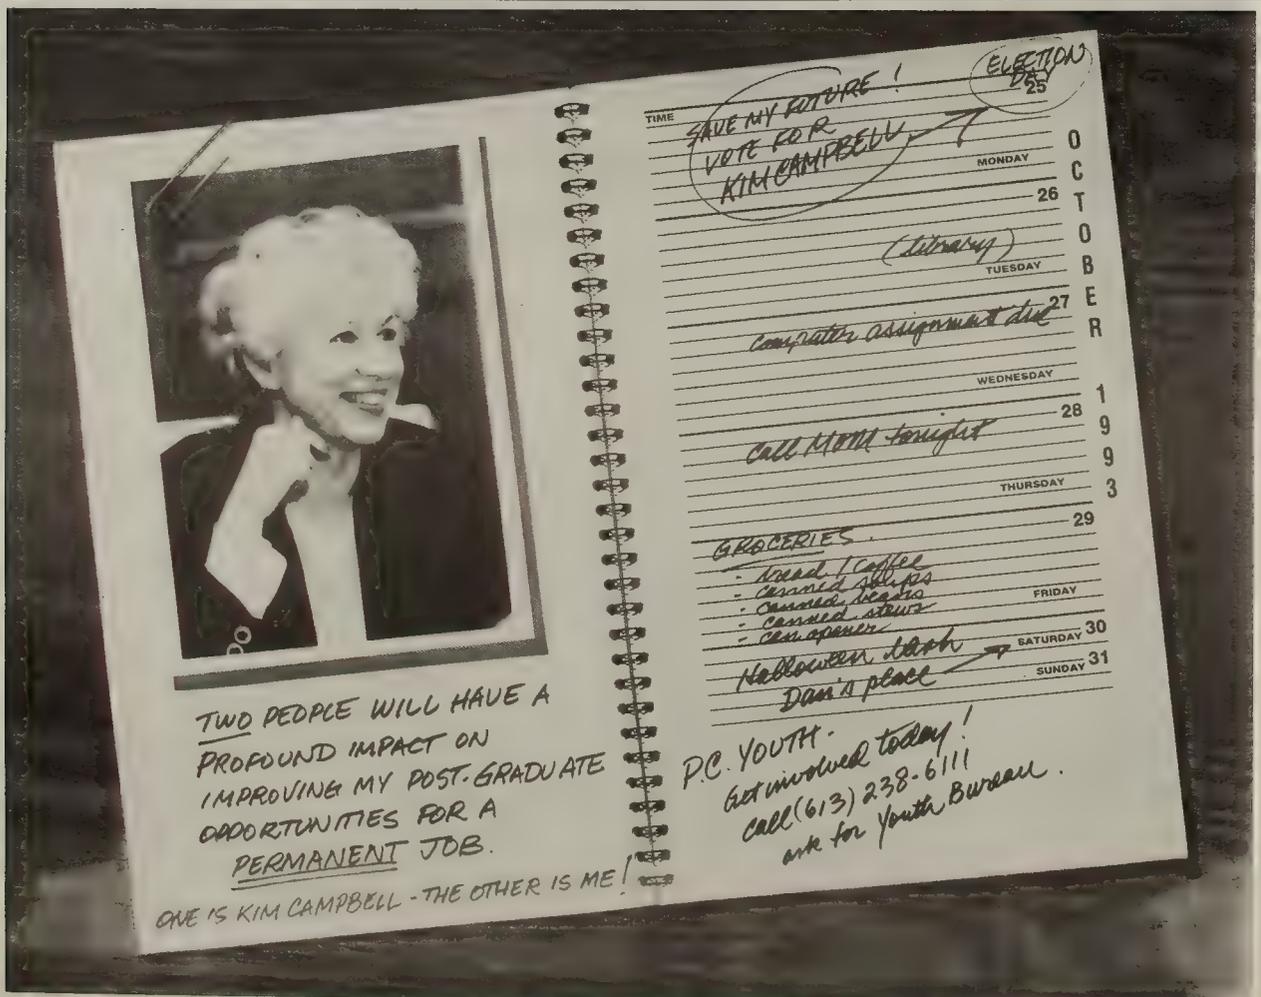

The worst are, by far, the pathetic and completely unsuitable local ads. Hector Clouthier's independent "Hello seniors" ads and Barbara Clark's NDP ads are so bad words cannot express it. Well, what can one expect from local TV?

The best overall ad is for the Marxist-Leninist party. A prim, middle-aged woman in a tweed suit with glasses and a bad word cannot express it. Well, what can one expect from local TV?

The best overall ad is for the Marxist-Leninist party. A prim, middle-aged woman in a tweed suit with glasses and a bad word cannot express it. Well, what can one expect from local TV?

Now that we've shown you the best and worst of the bunch, here's a word of warning: don't sit too close to the television.

Local candidate doesn't want votes Oct. 25

by Tim Pryor
Charlatan Staff

Keith "Clayoquot" Ashdown has no campaign manager, no volunteers working for him and no political party backing him. He doesn't even have a platform.

But he wants your vote Oct. 25.

The 21-year-old Ashdown is running as an independent candidate in the Ottawa Centre riding to help raise awareness about Clayoquot Sound, the British Columbia rainforest he says is in danger of being clear-cut.

The only independent candidate in this riding, Ashdown has no party affiliation and, like many independents, is running to raise awareness of a particular issue. In 1988, 54 independents ran in ridings across Canada and there were 10 independent Members of Parliament when the election was called Sept. 8.

According to Ashdown, the B.C. government decided on April 13 that a large portion of old-growth forest at Clayoquot Sound on Vancouver Island would be opened to logging.

By July 5, protestors had erected blockades to stop loggers from entering the area. Australian rockers Midnight Oil played a benefit concert there, which helped bring international attention to the plight of the forest.

"There's been a lot of fights in the forests around the world and there's been dozens of these occurrences, such as Clayoquot Sound," says Ashdown.

"Clayoquot Sound is the last straw for many people. Seven hundred people have gotten arrested there. It is the last low-lying temperate rainforest in the world. There are trees that are 1700 years old."

It's not only environmental damage that will be done if Clayoquot is lost, he says.

"It's our heritage. We don't have buildings as in Europe; we have trees. You have to protect it."

The decision by the Ottawa Coalition to Save Clayoquot Sound to field a candidate in the election was made at the last minute.

"We decided (to run) the Friday before Sept. 28, which was the last day you could apply to run in this election," says Ashdown. "The Ottawa Coalition to Save Clayoquot Sound decided to run a protest candidate in this election so at every all-candidates meeting and in the media (they'd) be bringing up the issue of Clayoquot Sound, because it has been ignored by all the political parties."

But don't expect Ashdown to have a 100-page book explaining ways to reduce the deficit, a plan to keep health care down, or a solution to the constitutional crisis.

"We all have our worldviews," says Ashdown, "But the only thing we are running on is the Clayoquot Sound issue. That is our only platform."

The coalition raised the $1,000 to get Ashdown's name on the ballot. The deposit to run increased $800 since the last election under new election legislation passed in May.

"It's undemocratic," he says of the increased fee. "There's a lot of other people that would love to run in this election, but they can't because of economic reasons and they're not in a situation where they can leave a job. Running for election is a privilege. (The candidates) can take time off and leave a job and the majority of Canadians can't do that."

Ashdown: "Clayoquot Sound is the last straw."

Ashdown says there are several reasons an independent would have difficulty getting elected and be effective once in power.

"An independent will not have the kind of power within the House of Commons. You don't have people working for you," says Ashdown.

He added that independent candidates don't get their fair share of media attention in debates and overall coverage. None of the students The Charlatan spoke to were even aware that Ashdown was running for election in Ottawa Centre. But they did have opinions on the effectiveness of voting for an independent candidate.

Frank Semrau, a PhD student in political science, says he thinks voting for an independent candidate might be better way of expressing discontent with the traditional parties than spoiling your ballot.

"It depends on how important you think your single vote is. If you think it is very important, you should not, in a way spoil it, in terms of giving it to an independent candidate," he says.

"I'd vote for an independent candidate if he or she were worthy of my vote. Everyone's got a right to run," says Lorraine Gabor, a third-year law and political science student.

But others disagree.

"I would probably only go with the political parties," says Jason Craig, a second-year economics student. "I believe in their stability more than an independent. If you vote for an independent, it doesn't really do much. It's a waste of a vote."

"I wouldn't vote for a candidate running independently, because I know they won't get elected. It would be a waste. I would stick to the main three or four (parties) that I know," says Namjoo Hashemi, a third-year international relations and business major.

Ashdown says he doesn't subscribe to any political doctrine. "I disagree with political dogma. I can't put myself into a box like that."

Although Ashdown says he realizes his chances of getting elected are remote, he has a plan in that unlikely event.

"First of all, I would cut my salary in half," he says. "I don't know what the citizens of Ottawa Centre want. It sounds political, but I would start knocking on doors to see what people do want in this region."

Apparently, his experience in politics has made Ashdown even more cynical about the electoral process.

"Politics suck," says Ashdown. "There's a lot of things you can't do. I don't like it."

"But it's a reality in our system and we've had to work with it and we're trying to use it to our success." □

Education ignored in election

In every election campaign, certain issues take the spotlight. The 1993 election is no different. Unfortunately, education is not one of the issues in the spotlight. It should be.

Every Canadian has been bombarded with a lot of talk about fighting the deficit and saving the economy over the past few weeks.

Kim Campbell says she will eliminate the deficit in five years by cutting government waste. Jean Chrétien says he will help the economy by pumping money into the economy which will create jobs. Preston Manning thinks he can eliminate the deficit in three years by cutting federal transfer payments to the provinces. All say they will preserve our current social system while in power.

But, these plans are all missing one crucial ingredient: education.

The only way to reduce the deficit and preserve our social system is through a healthy economy. A healthy economy is one that is competitive in world trade. This requires a highly skilled work force, which can only be attained through education.

However, education has rarely been mentioned in this election. When education has been discussed, it has usually been in a negative way. For example, talk of cutting federal transfer payments to the provinces for education.

As students, we are the first generation to realize just how important post-secondary education is. Without it, job prospects are absolutely dismal. Yet, every year, the government makes it more difficult for us to go to school. Tuition continues to skyrocket, loans are harder to get and classes are overcrowded. The government should be making it easier for people to go to school, not harder.

Education is an important investment, not just for students, but for the future of Canadian society as a whole. Any plan to cut the deficit and help the economy needs to include education.

Instead of talking about education, politicians are trying to offer quick-fix solutions to problems like job insecurity and the deficit. This isn't surprising, as politicians are interested in either staying in or gaining power. So, they seek out the broadest-based group for support - the middle-class.

Most middle-class Canadians are worried about preserving their current quality of life in these difficult times. Unfortunately, the solutions politicians offer them do not look toward the future.

So, what can students do as far as the upcoming election is concerned? Quite frankly, not too much. To vote in terms of who is best representing education would be foolish, because education is not being seriously addressed by any of the parties.

Yet, there is always something you can do. If you are unhappy about your tuition costs, your difficulty in obtaining a loan, or the general quality of education, don't be afraid to phone up your local Member of Parliament and ask them why this is so.

Also, it is important to be aware and supportive of student groups, like the Canadian Federation of Students, who are trying to stop what is happening to the post-secondary system.

It is clear that education is of utmost importance to our future and the future of the country. It is also clear that politicians are not properly addressing the issues. It is left to us students to try to do what we can. If we don't stand up for education, no one else will.

OPINION

Fraternities: myth and reality

by Robert K. Kiselewski

Robert K. Kiselewski graduated from Carleton in 1992 with a pass BA in law and political science and is now working on his honors BA in law. He helped found the local Sigma Pi chapter in 1992.

Exist, beer-guzzling rapists with homoerotic tendencies, or community volunteers who pledge to be scholastic achievers and to better one's self and society?

Based on what you know right now, which terms would you use to describe fraternity members?

Fraternities are, as they have been for centuries, objects of shrouded mystery. In an unsuccessful attempt to uncover the mystery, people outside fraternities create myths and rumors. These have had the effect of discrediting such organizations.

Myth #1: Joining a fraternity is a way of buying your friends.

The truth is dues, which are about $250-$350 annually, are applied against many expenses, including housing, office supplies, clothing, trips, scholarships, mementoes, insurance and charity. Friendships are developed over time, not with money.

Myth #2: Fraternities are elitist, homophobic and discriminatory.

Sigma Pi's policies for recruitment of potential members is they must be people who get along with other members and have the potential for leadership.

This forces fraternities to accept only the best possible members, rightfully labelling us elitists. However, respect for peers, no matter what their sexual or religious preference, is supported.

Visible minorities are ever present among our brotherhood. Co-ed fraternities exist in the United States and it's foreseeable that they will eventually cross the border into Canada. In the mean time, our sister fraternities, sororities, are a strong group.

Myth #3: Fraternity houses, members and parties are a great combination for regular bulk alcohol consumption and obnoxious "girlfriend-on-period" type humor.

The days of "Animal House" are gone. Sigma Pi's local and international policies encourage non-alcoholic events. Other fraternities have identical policies. Also, local chapters are forbidden from purchasing alcohol for members.

Myth #4: Fraternity members are the number-one rapists on campus.

The date rape video shown by Carleton's students' association during frosh week portrayed fraternity members as rapists. Although there have been links between fraternity members and rape in the U.S., no such incident has occurred at Carleton. If such an incident did occur, the local chapter of the fraternity would be disassociated from the international fraternity which certifies them.

Sigma Pi is one fraternity that educates its members on an on-going basis about rape prevention, AIDS and safe sex.

Myth #5: Fraternities have homoerotic, abusive and degrading initiation rites.

Please see Myths #4, 3 and 2. If fraternities work hard to be better people, why would we degrade someone who's coming into the group?

Myth #6: You can't graduate from Carleton University if you are a fraternity member.

This rumor is untrue, according to the best knowledge of Jim Kennelly, Carleton's ombudsperson and Robin Farquhar, the university president and also, according to my research that turned up no laws. If this is true, the school has to pull my degree. Be it known, Carleton uses one system of granting degrees: marks.

Myth #7: Carleton University refuses to acknowledge the existence of fraternities on campus and encourages an active disassociation.

Carleton's senate and board of governors have no written, unwritten or implied policies to discourage joining such groups. Neither is there any policy regarding the hiring of fraternity members for positions on campus.

According to Farquhar, if the students' association were to hold a referendum asking students whether or not fraternities should be acknowledged and a majority of the students answered "yes," then Farquhar, although not bound, would consider associating the university with fraternities and sororities.

These are the myths surrounding fraternities. So, who are these fraternity members nicknamed Riggs, Lefty, Mo, Crash, Walter or Slider? Fraternity members go on to hold respected places in society. They are the leaders of countries, like former U.S. president George Bush, Bill Mensch, the engineer that helped pioneer the microprocessor industry, and men who explored space, like Walter M. Scirra, Jr., astronaut on Mercury flight "Sigma 7" and the Apollo missions.

Fraternity members are not angels, but people fallible to human thought and behavior. Yet, we pledge to believe in ourselves, our group. United in brotherhood, we advance truth and justice and promote scholarship, helping society progress. Always free feel to approach a member and ask questions. Maybe together we can help elevate sceptics from blissful ignorance. □

India helped by Carleton

Editor:
 I would like to take this opportunity to thank everyone involved in helping raise almost $200 for the Indian Earthquake Relief Fund. Thanks to Lucy Watson, Sheri Boyd, Claire Campbell, Raj Doobay, Song Cho, Tony Monpturo and everyone at OPIRG Carleton.

The biggest thanks go to the people who donated money at Oliver's on Wednesday, Oct. 6, 1993. It was these people, who had more on their minds than having a good time, who helped save lives in India.

The money has been sent to India's high commissioner on behalf of all Carleton University students.

Jim says play safe at Panda

Editor:
 Earlier this summer, the Panda Game was cancelled for a number of reasons, including scheduling conflicts at Lansdowne Park and escalating costs in holding the game.

As someone who has attended every Panda Game since 1980, I was pleased to intervene in an effort to get the game back on track.

Thanks to work by the University of Ottawa's and Carleton's athletics departments and Carleton's student association, the game was saved. I look forward to attending Panda on Sunday, Oct. 24.

Many people found it mildly amusing that as the councillor for Ottawa South and the Glebe I would be pushing to keep the Panda Game alive, given its less than positive image in the community. I stood up to defend the Panda Game because I believe it is one of the best traditions that students have at Carleton.

Every year, many neighbors in Ottawa South and the Glebe dread Panda because of the behavior of a small minority of students. I am asking students to please respect the neighborhoods that you travel through on your way to and from Lansdowne Park.

If you are planning a Panda party, please take into consideration your neighbors. This will help keep Panda alive for years to come.

A great number of people from your students' association, Lansdowne Park and the Ottawa Police work very hard to ensure that the Panda Game goes off without a hitch. I am seeking your cooperation in making Panda a success.

Committee misses mark

Editor:
 I find it very interesting that the Queen's University Alma Mater Society has created the Hidden Hunger Committee, ("Halting student hunger," The Charlatan, Oct. 14, 1993) while actively supporting a student group that advocates a 30 per cent tuition increase, coupled with a regressive form of student loans, ("New student group promotes higher tuition," The Charlatan, Oct. 14, 1993).

Student poverty, hunger and inability to meet basic needs will not be solved by food drives and hotlines. These are Band-Aid solutions. I suggest that Matthew Blake, organizer of the committee, make the link between student poverty and the 30 per cent tuition increase and regressive student loans advocated by his Alma Mater Society.

Get an opinion and vote!

Editor:
 I am writing with regards to the "streeters" inquiring about the impending federal election, ("Shut up and listen!" The Charlatan, Sept. 30, 1993). I find it difficult to believe that the students who appeared represent the average Carleton student voter. In the very least, I hope they are not average.

Two students were opinion-less, one said he would vote for the Reform Party, and the other was a Liberal. As I understand, the reporter questioned 30 people before finding these four who were willing to offer their opinion or lack thereof.

This election, like all federal elections is crucial to the future of our country. It is not a time for complacency.

When I graduate from university, I want to be confident that there will be a job waiting for me. While I am still here, I want the security of low-income housing, quality education and a fair and equitable student loan program. I did not have to look far to find the candidate who will fight for these rights on my behalf.

That candidate is Marion Dewar. Marion Dewar is the only candidate in Ottawa Centre who has shown, by action, not rhetoric, that she is committed to the issues which are important to me.

This is a university, a place of education. So, educate yourself about this election and the candidates in your riding and vote for the one who best represents your views. The politicians will never care what becomes of students if the students don't care who becomes their politicians.

Why not a woman?

Editor:
 It is appropriate President Farquhar would commemorate the administration building by naming it after Gordon Robertson, the bureaucrat's bureaucrat and a career federal bureaucrat involved with Carleton. But, are there not other possibilities?

Robertson's career is instructive and merits close scrutiny. As commissioner of the Northwest Territories from 1953 to 1963, was Robertson practising white, liberal imperialism?

The question is one of many before the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples. He and the Inuit have presented their recollections of what transpired.

He moved 13 Inuit families from Hudson's Bay to Grise Fiord in the Arctic, 3,000 kilometres closer to the North Pole. Living conditions were considerably different from what they were accustomed to. They confronted perpetual nights. They were helped by having three Native families from Pond Inlet to help adjust to the change and the RCMP were present.

It was a difficult situation for the Inuit. The money the Inuit made from their fur trade was not given to them, but was taken by the federal government.

There is no question that there are different interpretations of what transpired during that 10-year period, and the Royal Commission report may not resolve it to anyone's satisfaction. None the less, until that happens should Farquhar be so hasty in naming the building after Robertson?

As well, if the building is to be named after someone, why not Pauline Jewett? Or Dolores Neilson? Or Jean Loates? The latter two knew something about administration and Carleton from first-hand knowledge, as they were both long-time administrators in various capacities at Carleton for over 35 years. There is not one building on campus named after a woman, yet Carleton's administration prides itself on its equity program.

Doug needs help

Editor:
 One of the most surprising components of the election has been the Natural Law Party. Even more surprising is all the attention they seem to be getting. Its biggest claim to fame is that Doug Henning, the washed-out seventies' magician, is one of its star candidates. Henning used to be a star; now his head is in the moon.

When celebrities lose their status, they often seek therapy of some sort. Unfortunately, for a failing Canadian magician, transcendental meditation was the cure-all. If the Maharishi Yogi was good enough for the Fab Four, he was most certainly competent to help Dougie.

Twenty years ago, Henning was a magician. Ten years ago he was a magician pushing cable boxes in local Ottawa TV ads. In 1993, he's just pushing it. What goes up must come down. That includes flying yogis and ex-celebrity magicians who need a haircut.

Save this House!

The Charlatan Election Supplement

by Brent Dowdall and Blayne Haggart

Charlatan Staff

In the midst of an election campaign, the attention of the media focuses on the day-to-day activities of the leaders and the candidates. Things like the silly remarks by the prime minister and the number of yogic flyers needed to reduce the national debt.

These petty topics overshadow more basic questions, like who or what are we voting for? Why do we even perform this ritual every four or five years?

The popular belief is that we live in a glorious democracy. But it's not at all clear that we do. Power is wielded by the few non-directly elected offices, such as that of prime minister. Professional lobbyists huddle in the corridors of power like mercenaries, waiting to pounce on a government contract.

Democratic reform has hovered on the fringes of the campaign as an issue, but few people have taken an interest in raising it.

Democracy Watch is a two-week-old, Ottawa-based organization which was formed to promote citizen participation in the democratic process in Canada.

The group is financed with proceeds generated by a book entitled Canada's Firsts: Ralph Nader's Salute to Canada and Canadian Achievement, which Democracy Watch's co-ordinator Duff Conacher co-authored with Nader and Nadia Milleron.

Democracy Watch is producing a report card on all the major parties' attitudes toward democratic reform. Its interim report card gives the new National Party the highest grade, but that's only a C. The Liberal, New Democrat and Reform parties get Ds, while the Tories and the Bloc Québécois get incomplete grades because they have no position on most of the group's criteria.

The group's terms for a better democracy include reforming the electoral system, changing election financing to better control who funds campaigns and making MPs more accountable to their constituents.

Conacher says he supports some kind of proportional representation, where the percentage of seats won is relatively close to the percentage of the popular vote. This is in direct contrast to Canada's system, where a party can win a majority of the seats in Parliament with a minority of the popular vote. This is because MPs only need the most votes in their riding, not a majority.

Carleton political science professor Glen Williams is also a supporter of proportional representation. As well, he favors term limits on politicians.

"We would be better served if there were term limits, so no one could serve more than 15 years," Williams says.

As it is, Conacher says he has serious complaints about the state of Canadian democracy.

"I don't think Canada's very democratic at all: politically, socially or economically," he says.

He points to the lack of any real influence backbenchers have in Parliament and election financing laws which sway politicians to favor their financial backers.

In order to get a cabinet job, backbenchers must back the leader, even if this means Members of Parliament supporting policies that are reviled by their constituents. Like, say, the Goods and Services Tax.

Because of this system, says Conacher, "when you vote, your vote doesn't count."

Conacher's doubts about the system are shared by many people, including students.

"As far as choosing the direction that the country will go, there is no democracy," says a Carleton third-year political science student Fred Minna.

"We're democratic in name and, compared to other parts of the world, we are, but we still have a ways to go," says another third-year political science student, Aaron Goldstein.

But others disagree. Carleton political science professor Robert Jackson says Canadian democracy is not in dire straits.

"There's no pure, absolute democracy," says Jackson, who formerly served as an advisor to former Liberal leader and prime minister John Turner. Jackson is also regular commentator on Global TV.

"There are 185 countries in the world, and relative to those countries, Canada is one of the oldest and most successful democracies on earth."

Jackson says proportional representation would lead to "an even more fractionalized 'pizza' Parliament," because he says regional and minor parties would hold even more seats than they do now.

Jackson also brings up the role of leaders in the Canadian system. In contrast to advocating more influence from the grassroots, he says leadership from "the top" is more efficient. He says Canada's current problems stem from a lack of leadership from any party leaders.

"We have weak leadership," he says. "Great leadership requires a coherent national vision and high executive talent."

But is strong leadership, or the idea of strong leadership, the solution or the problem?

At least one person would say that Canada's struggle for democracy is hindered by the cult of "the leader."

Patrick Watson is the chairman of the CBC and narrator of the acclaimed documentary series The Struggle For Democracy, which traces the history of democracy from ancient Athens to the present day.

Watson says Canada has the best democratic system in the world, but the system would be better off if people would stop looking for a strong, charismatic leader.

"We don't hear our elected leaders advising people about their ability to proceed as individuals (in a democracy)," says Watson. "There is a very bad hangover from royal tradition."

He says the royal tradition has led to cynicism, and cynicism "lets people off the hook" when it comes to participating in the political process.

There has never been, and probably never will be, a perfect democracy. This doesn't mean we can't make Canada's better.

Perhaps that change lies in the changing the way we elect people. Perhaps it lies in changing election spending laws.

Wherever it lies, there is no denying Canada is a democracy. But our democracy does need improvement, if only because many people simply aren't happy with it.

Students could care less about apathy

by Michael Mainville
Charlatan Staff

Although apathy among young voters has been high in the recent past, students might buck the trend this year with increased participation in the 1993 election.

According to Elections Canada's statistics, the university student age group has traditionally had the least interest in voting federally. In Canadian national election surveys, voters between the ages of 18 and 25 have had the lowest turnout of all age groups in the last three federal elections.

But some say the issues in the 1993 election, such as the recession, the job market and the future of post-secondary education, seem to have raised student interest.

"Students are getting more politically conscious and will be getting out to vote," says Denise McCulloch, youth liaison for Elections Canada.

Even though Elections Canada didn't provide an enumeration booth at Carleton for off-campus students, McCulloch says she feels student participation in the election will be higher than in the past. She says students seem to be more interested in voting.

Most of Elections Canada's efforts to inform students about voting have been directed towards first-time voters and those who have recently moved to a new riding, she says.

McCulloch added that Elections Canada's promotion programs, including extensive advertising campaigns and election simulation kits, seem to have had a positive effect.

"There seems to be a lot of political movement on Canadian university campuses. I received a lot of phone calls from student councils and student political groups," says McCulloch. "They were hoping to get more material to be handed out on campuses."

The Canadian Federation of Students has attempted similar measures during the campaign, says Jocelyn Charron, communications co-ordinator for the national student lobby group.

Charron says the CFS hopes it reached as many students as possible with on-campus posters and national advertising in print, radio and on television.

"We tried to get the point across that students must vote, that something is at stake," says Charron.

Although they have had some success informing students, Charron says they are "fighting a trend of distrust in politics and politicians in general."

Charron says since so many of the issues in the election affect students directly, they should get informed.

But students are aware of election issues, says Kristine Haselsteiner, vice-president external of the Carleton University Students' Association.

"I think students are extremely informed and curious about the election," says Haselsteiner.

She says she discovered this while tending an election information booth in Baker Lounge over the past three weeks. Haselsteiner says many students used the telephones CUSA provided at the booth to call up local candidates and ask them questions.

Although Haselsteiner says an enumeration booth on campus would have made the election much simpler for students, she says CUSA's efforts seem to be making a difference.

"Even though cynicism is very high, I think there is a good interest in the election," she says.

Taking their interest one step further, some students have even become involved in the electoral process by volunteering for the various candidates in Ottawa Centre.

Cree Lanbeck, a first-year environmental studies student at Carleton, is a volunteer for NDP candidate Marion Dewar. She has been working to get support for Dewar in Carleton's residences.

Her duties include canvassing in Lanark residence, handing out pamphlets and answering students' questions about NDP policies.

After talking to numerous residence students, Lanbeck says she thinks "most students will be voting."

This feeling is echoed by Lanark resident and first-year arts student Miles Cooke, who says "most of the people I know will be voting in the election."

So it seems that despite the apathy of the past, many Carleton students are overcoming their doubts, getting informed and registering to vote. □

Political clubs active in campus campaign

by Jill Mahoney

Charlatan Staff

Membership in Carleton's political clubs has swelled because of students' interest in the federal election, say the clubs' leaders.

As of September, the approximate membership of the campus political clubs was: 150 Conservatives, 56 Liberals, 30 NDPers and 10 Reformers. All figures are up from this time last year, say the club leaders, although exactly how much is difficult to tell, because membership fluctuates during the course of each school year.

Lucy Sharratt, co-chair of the Carleton University New Democratic Youth Club, credits the increases in club membership to the election campaign.

"I think it's actually increased interest for people to be involved in the party because they realize there is an election and that it's an important time to become involved," she says. "Lots of people have signed up without even questioning."

All the leaders say increased membership is positive because they need more people to help candidates with their campaigns.

Max Fishman, president of the Reform Party of Canada Club of Carleton University, says the election has changed the attitudes of club members.

"Before people were happy to be members and to come to meetings, but now with the election, people want to become more involved and are more eager to help," he says.

Campus political clubs become involved in their parties' campaigns in different ways, but all say they are an important link between students and politicians.

Dave Gourlay, president of the Carleton University Young Liberal Association, says his club's main responsibility is the campus campaign to re-elect Liberal MP Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre).

Club members have done pamphlet drops and canvassed in residence, he says, and some are involved in Harb's headquarters as well as canvassing off-campus.

"This election is very important for young people,"

Gourlay says. "We're talking about the deficit being eliminated in five years or three years or 10 years. We, this generation, will have to deal with it."

Miké Bonser, policy chairperson for Harb's campaign, says Carleton's Liberal club does a lot of legwork for the campaign.

"They're, more than anything, a link between students and their concerns and us. They're our eyes and ears because they're able to tell us what happens at Carleton."

Katie Robinette is vice-president external of the Carleton University Progressive Conservative Campus ordination. How do I know the main issues of concern students are facing? The club has been vital in briefing Lee."

Sharratt says the New Democratic Party club is focusing on gaining recognition for the party on campus.

"At pre-election time, we have a responsibility to publicize the policies of the NDP and support candidates who are running, and to be a presence as a club."

Sharratt says the club aims to make people aware of the different issues involved in the election by setting up tables on the North American Free Trade Agreement, women's issues and the economy. She says the club is focusing on NAFTA as a major issue because it feels free trade is not receiving enough attention as an election issue.

Sharratt added club members are also canvassing in residences and making sure students know they can vote.

Fishman says the Reform club is involved in many different Ottawa-area candidates' campaigns.

"We serve as a link to student issues and the candidate," he says. "We're always asked by candidates 'what do students want?' and we supply them with answers. We also supply volunteers for various ridings, whatever their needs may be."

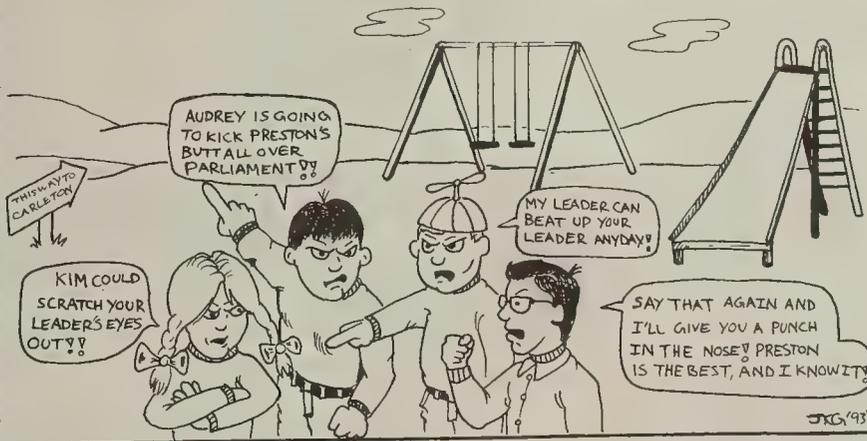

He says the club's main goal is to inform people about what the Reform Party stands for by setting up information tables and inviting local Reform candidates to speak.

Fishman says the people involved in campus politics gain knowledge in all areas of politics, but also enjoy other fringe benefits.

"Bluntly put, chances of employment on the Hill become better, especially if you have experience," he says. "MPs on the Hill look for young people with energy."

Gourlay says involvement in campus politics has long-range implications for Canada's political future.

"I just want young people to get involved," he says. "If young people are not involved, we're not going to have a political system in 10 or 15 years because no one will care." □ Association. She says the whole focus of the club has changed because of the election.

"People are joining because they want to work within the election strategy aspect of it," she says. "They're all interested to learn what goes on."

Between elections, club members are placed on Parliament Hill to volunteer with Tory MPs. But now, she says, the club is trying to get its members involved in Ian Lee's campaign in Ottawa Centre. She says people take part by helping in Lee's office or by canvassing in the residences.

Robert Fielder, Lee's campaign manager, says the club has been organizing all aspects of Lee's campaign at Carleton.

The Handy-dandy Charlatan Election Guide

by Christina Craft and Derek DeCloet

Charlatan Staff

It's time for Carleton students to vote and The Charlatan decided to find out how each of the candidates stands on issues important to students. We asked the Ottawa Centre candidate the five major national parties the same five questions. Here is how they responded:

1) Why should a student vote for you to be a Member of Parliament?

The National Party wants to have national standards for education where tuition fees are equalized.

• They want education to be available to anyone who wants it, right away. The party wants to set up a system whereby anyone who can't find a job would not have to pay back any student loans until they do find jobs. Student loans would be paid back through income taxes.

• They want to increase funding to schools and have schools offer work term experience in classes.

• They want to create national standards for credits so students can transfer credits from college to university and vice-versa.

2) What would your party do to answer the concerns students have about the high cost of post-secondary education, including federal education transfers and the Canada Student Loan plan?

NOTE: The question was also answered by the first response.

• The National Party wants federal education transfers to be increased to the provinces.

• The Canada Student Loan plan will not be cut in any way. The National Party wants to reorganize the plan to make it more efficient and make loans easier to obtain and pay back, through income taxes after graduation. Obtaining a student loan will not be based on parents' incomes.

3) What hope does your party offer to graduating university students in terms of job creation?

• The National Party has an economic strategy of full employment.

• The National Party wants to revive research and development spending in Canada.

• The National Party wants Canada to become a leader in environmental technology, using more people working with the environment.

• The National Party wants to create demand for scientists and engineers.

4) In an era of rising costs for education and high unemployment, why should students care about the deficit?

• The deficit is not the National Party's number one priority — the problem with the debt is it is financed from foreign financial institutions.

• The deficit is overblown by the Conservatives and the Reform Party.

• "The deficit is a concern, but all countries are running a deficit, so it is not a big concern," Goddard said over the phone.

5) a) If there was a free vote in parliament to re-criminalize abortion, how would you vote?

a) No.
b) Yes.
c) No.
d) No, but we would restructure.
e) Yes.
f) No.
g) No.

b) Do you think gays and lesbians have the same rights as heterosexuals, including the right to legally marry?

c) No — maybe increase.
d) No — investigate.
e) Yes.
f) Yes.
g) No.

c) Will you cut funding to programs for people with disabilities?

d) Will you cut funding to programs for multiculturalism?
e) Does your party support official bilingualism?
f) Does your party support affirmative action?
g) Do you support user fees for health care?
h) What will your party do to help eradicate poverty?

d) Will you cut funding to programs for multiculturalism?

a) No.
b) Yes.
c) No.
d) No, but we would restructure.
e) Yes.
f) No.
g) No.

e) Does your party support official bilingualism?

h) • The National Party has a full-employment policy.
• Spending on education is the key.
• There will be no cuts to social programs and, if anything, there will be increased funding.
• Instead of cuts, the National Party wants to cut transfer payments to corporations and eliminate corporate tax loopholes.

f) Does your party support affirmative action?

Devar asks, "What is the deficit? Expenditures on post-secondary education and on health care are not causing the deficit — they are an investment."

• Dewar says her real concern is servicing the debt and high interest rates. The NDP would lower interest rates.

• The government has "decreased expenditures federally in post-secondary education and health, and the deficit still increased."

g) Do you support user fees for health care?

Devar says the NDP is the only party to put forward a comprehensive, full-employment program — including money for research and development. The NDP wants to have a partnership between employers, employees and the government for the purpose of retraining. Dewar says Canada spends $7 per employee for retraining while Japan spends $700 per employee.

• The NDP would support the arts, so culture and communication become a vital part of the economic right now.

h) What will your party do to help eradicate poverty?

Devar wants to restore transfer payments to the pre-1978 level, which were higher than they are right now.

JOHN FOSTER

The National Party (729-0531). Foster's campaign manager, Jéff Goddard, submitted a written response. The following is a summary.

MARION DEWAR

New Democratic Party (231-4648). Responded in an interview.

wants the transfers to be increased for post-secondary education.

• Lee says he's the only candidate to talk about student issues "in a meaningful, substantive way."
• A Carleton business professor, he says he believes his policy proposals about education show that he's "the only candidate trying to raise these issues onto the public agenda."

IAN LEE
Progressive Conservative Party
(566-4533), Responded to an interview

• Lee advocates a tri-semester system. The university would operate year-round and no course would be longer than four months. The semester allows a student to work (or) a term, go to school (for) a term and then become much more self-financing," he says.
• Lee says he advocates keeping general education transfers at their current levels. "It would be disastrous to promise (an increase) when we know the fragile fiscal crisis the government is in," he says.
• As for Canada Student Loans, Lee wants to eliminate the means test so students could get a loan regardless of their parents' incomes.
• Lee wants the government to be tougher when it comes to paying the loans back. The loans would be paid back through income taxes. Nobody with a student loan to pay off would be allowed to use tax shelters.

• Harb says his record as Ottawa Centre's MP shows he's student-oriented. "I've probably spoken more than any other MP about education," he says, adding that the Liberals' proposal for a national youth apprenticeship program offers hope for students who want job experience.

MACHARE
Liberal Party incumbent
(232-3456), Responded in an interview

• Harb says the Liberals would increase transfers for education "to an acceptable level." And provinces must be forced to use all of that money on education — something that's not happening right now, he says. Harb introduced a private member's bill in 1991 (Bill C-426, which failed) to ban provinces from spending money that is earmarked for education on other things, like health care or highways.
• Harb says the Canada Student Loan program should be changed, but only after consultation with students. "It is my honest belief that education must become a right, rather than being a privilege as it is right now."

"I'm not giving the good old days" speech," says the 38-year-old Tucker. He says his age is an asset, putting him "in touch with the needs of young people."

LEN TUCKER
Reform Party
(232-0850), Responded in an interview

• Tucker says the Reform Party would not cut federal education transfers. Instead of giving money to the provinces, they would give education vouchers directly to the students, creating competition between universities for students, because rather than receiving base funding from the provinces, universities would depend directly on the number of students enrolled for their funding. Tucker calls it "empowerment of the students."
• Tucker says he wants to eliminate means tests for Canada Student Loans, advocating income-contingent loans, which would have to be repaid faster by graduates with higher incomes. Those whose income is lower than that of the average Canadian (about $22,000) would not have to make payments on their loans until they start making more.

• Lee says the Tories have focused on small business, which he says creates 80 per cent of Canadian jobs. The Liberals' economic plan only emphasizes construction jobs, he says. "I don't believe that people go to university to then go out and dig holes," he says.

• Harb says the key to reducing the deficit is to create more jobs, so more people are paying taxes. "We believe that students are right in saying, 'Look, give me a job, and I'll try and help with deficit reduction. But get me a job first.'"

• Tucker says the debt has to be decreased because it creates high taxes, which in turn burdens employers. "Continued overspending cost of doing business. Companies have been telling me, 'Listen, not a high unemployment,'" says Tucker.

g) Poverty is created by a lack of jobs, says Tucker. "The tax burden on the small business sector should be reduced, so it can create those jobs. But, he notes, "government can't promise everything."

Rather than spoil your ballot...

by Ian Mcleod
Charlatan Staff

Fed up with the state of politics in this country? Do the blow-dried blowhards stumping for the major parties give you the heebie-jeebies? Well, don't spoil that ballot just yet; you do have a few options.

There are 13 registered parties running in this election, a record number. A party has to have 50 candidates run to be a registered party with their name on the ballot. Some of these folks didn't get their say at the two big televised debates and some of them didn't even get their say at the fringe debate of the smaller parties Oct. 5.

Here are some of the lesser known parties that are vying for the electorate's attention, as well as a brief summary of their platforms.

ABOLITIONIST PARTY Led by Ottawa-area gambling entrepreneur John Turmel, the Abolitionists claim to stand for the abolition of interest rates. The party is only six weeks old but is fielding 80 candidates, primarily in Ontario.

Ottawa Centre candidate Pauline Morrisette has been deliberately evasive about party policy and Turmel himself is alleged by the Ottawa Citizen to have been barred from the fringe debate for refusing to follow the set format and demanding three minutes to give a speech.

In the 1988 election, Turmel ran as an independent candidate in Ottawa Centre and generated a storm of controversy when he staged a sit-in at a candidates debate from which he had been excluded.

Candidates claim the solutions to the country's problems are to be found on mysterious diskettes they all seem to carry around.

CANADA PARTY Joseph Thauberger is the leader of this Western-based party, whose platform seems to revolve almost exclusively on the linchpin of monetary reform, like taking monetary control away from private banks and putting control in the hands of the Bank of Canada. They are not running a candidate in Ottawa Centre.

CHRISTIAN HERITAGE PARTY Led by Heather Stilwell, a mother of eight, the Ten Commandments are the rule of law for Christian Heritage. Despite this Scripture-centred belief, and their anti-abortion, anti-gay stance, Stilwell claimed during the television debate that their party was "not exclusionary." Go figure. They don't have a candidate in this riding either.

GREEN PARTY Led by Chris Lea, this group of social, environmental and political activists, based in Vancouver, wants to create an "environmentally sustainable" economy. That is, they want to create jobs without hurting the environment. They would replace the Goods and Services Tax and lower current income taxes, replacing them with taxes based on resource use, waste disposal and, generally, environmental damage. Their candidate in this riding is Frank Thompson. They are affiliated with the international Green movement.

MARXIST-LENINIST PARTY Under the leadership of Ottawa Centre candidate Hardial Bains, the Marxist-Leninists would try to bring about democratic change and empower the people through referenda, overhauled social programs (including domestic help for all at least once a week), the ability of people to propose legislation and direct responsibility of the politicians to the electorate, including recall of MPs.

NATURAL LAW PARTY Neil Paterson is both the leader and Ottawa Centre candidate for his party. This party is trying to bring both the power of transcendental meditation and the teachings of Maharishi Mahesh Yogi to government. The Maharishi was the spiritual guru of the Beatles in the late 1960s and developed the theories of transcendental meditation.

According to their campaign promises, a group of 7,000 "yogic flyers" can direct their positive mental energies into affecting the government. Believe it or not, they are fielding 231 candidates, the fourth largest number of any party.

PARTY FOR THE COMMONWEALTH OF CANADA A group with links to arch-conservative American politician Lyndon Larouche. Their local candidate is Marie Therese Costisella. The party's main objective is to create a republic commonwealth of Canada where we would be independent politically from England.

PARTIRHINOCEROS Those wacky men and women of the Rhinos have suffered their share of trials and tribulations since the last election and have split into two factions, because some party insiders wanted to treat the election as more than just a joke.

The flippant Montreal-based Rhino Classique wants to move the capital of Canada to the Ottawa in Texas, so it will be warmer all-year round and it wants to knock down the Rockies so it won't be always raining in Vancouver.

The Regina-based Born-Again Rhino Force, known by its acronym BARF, would introduce a universal credit card, so every Canadian could buy the things needed for a minimum standard of living. "BARF will abolish everything that cuts trees except old-fashioned two-man bucksaws."

The original Rhino party has been de-registered, while BARF and Rhino Classique don't have enough candidates to qualify as official parties.

So, if Kim and Chrétien can't, Preston seems putrescent and you want to "bloc" Bouchard out, think about one of these men and women. It may not count for much, but that vote does count. ☐

The Charlatan's residence election poll may not be as scientific as one done by the Decima Research group or Angus Reid, but it gives us some insight on the political landscape at Carleton.

The poll was a random sample of 388 students who were approached at the entrance to the residence dining room on Monday, Sept. 27.

They were asked, "Are you going to vote and if so, for what party?"

The majority of those interviewed live in residence, but a few are off-campus students using the meal plan offered in residence.

Sixteen per cent of the decided students said they would cast their votes for the Liberals and the Progressive Conservatives garnered 14.2 per cent to finish second among the parties. The others, including Reform, the NDP and National Party, trailed far behind the big two. Only nine per cent of students said they would not vote.

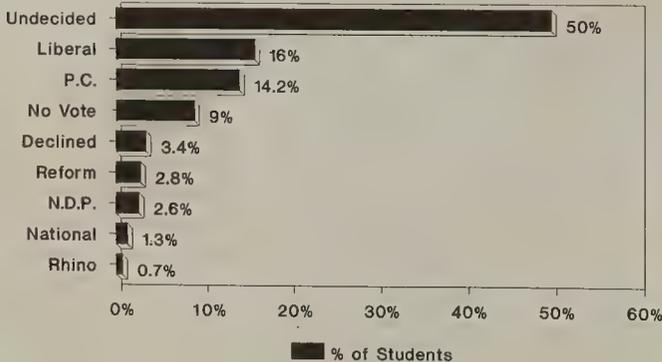

A poll with 50 per cent undecided does not give any clear indication on the outcome of the election. Although it is highly unlikely, our results indicate the National Party could still form a majority government. Even some of the decided voters claimed they might change their minds.

Our research does tell us that over 90 per cent of students are planning on voting, compared to the national voter turnout of about 75 per cent in 1988. The poll

If Carleton has followed recent Canadian poll trends, the Reform Party will have gained support, while the Conservatives will have lost some ground. The Liberals and NDP will still be in first and fourth place respectively.

In the 1988 election, Mac Harb of the Liberals lost all four of the voting polls in Carleton's residence, despite winning the Ottawa Centre riding by 762 votes.

The most popular candidate in residence that year was Progressive Conservative Bob Plamondon, who won all four polls. The total spread in residence between Harb and Plamondon, however, was only 33 votes. The NDP trailed in third spot, 155 votes behind the Tories.

Women get the NAC of voting

by Angie Gallop
Charlatan Staff

When asked to write an article on women and the vote it occurred to me how ironic the whole concept was.

Why must a feminist organization like the National Action Committee on the Status of Women (NAC) exist to further the special interests of women?

Women's groups are not "special interest groups," according to the organization's voters' guide, which was put out in June and written by former NAC president Judy Rebick and Huguette Léger, a member of NAC's executive.

The interests of 52 per cent of the population are not special interests — they are public interests.

NAC is the largest feminist organization in Canada, which represents about 500 women's groups and receives grants from the Canadian government.

The guide was put out to provide information on issues relating to women's equality.

So why must an article on women and the vote be written?

According to Jill Vickers, a professor of political science and Canadian studies at Carleton, women have a different relationship to the state than men.

Vickers says because women are by and large still left with the responsibility of child care, they are more dependent on federal funding for such things as housing, daycare, and social assistance.

But according to NAC's voters' guide, women were virtually absent from constitutional reform negotiations at both Meech Lake and Charlottetown, and the media is still not reporting the impact of federal policies on women.

The guide criticizes free trade, taxation, cutbacks to social programs and other government policies. For instance:

- There has been an 11 per cent reduction in women's employment in manufacturing since the Free Trade Agreement.

- Taxation policies allow men to deduct child support payments from their taxes while divorced women receiving these payments must pay taxes on them. The average amount of child support is half the cost of child rearing.

- Cutbacks to social programs affect women the most because women make up the majority of workers in the social and health services.

- Women's unpaid labor, such as staying home to take care of children, tends to pick up the slack from funding cuts to social services like daycare.

But this federal election promises to be different because we have two women as leaders of the more established, traditional parties.

Or does it?

"The fact that you have women leaders does not necessarily mean that issues of particular concern to women are being dealt with either by political parties or by the media," says Vickers.

Right now, out of 25 cabinet posts, women hold five positions, including Prime Minister Kim Campbell. Brian Mulroney's last cabinet had seven women cabinet ministers out of 35 positions.

Women are still invisible in a political domain which was made by and is still dominated by men, Vickers says.

"The political system was developed by men before women were even legally allowed to participate," she says. "It was a very narrow segment of men who were competing to control the instruments of the state.

"Women now have the vote and are interested in making policy," says Vickers. "Those women don't just want to choose between brand A and brand B. They want to have an input into making actual policy decisions — and they want political parties and politicians who do what they say they Right now we have a "first past the post" electoral system. The person who has the most votes wins — even if the total number of votes for other candidates may exceed the votes the winner receives.

"Conventional political parties, political science and the media define politics very narrowly," says Vickers. "Women, like some men, share an alienation from official politics. . . . Issues that interest most women are not being debated in official politics, but are being debated in social movements."

Vickers says this "narrow definition" of politics is why politicians don't talk about topics like aboriginal issues, child-care issues or the environment.

Some students agree.

"They are really dealing in a patriarchal framework and they are perpetuating it," says Pat Gentile, a student in her qualifying year for graduate studies in Canadian studies. "I don't think anything . . . to make this a better society can ever really be addressed in a patriarchal framework."

"The agenda has to be rewritten, basically. The most disappointing thing about Kim Campbell is that she assumes we have to keep the same agenda which totally excludes the needs of women," says another student, Nancy Janovick. "We are assuming that day care isn't going to help because it doesn't fit into the agenda of jobs, jobs, jobs."

What these opinions indicate is that invisibility in political institutions and the mainstream media is a reality for Canadian women. That is the irony for 52 per cent of the population. Until our society starts to make and report on government policy with the interests of both women and men in mind, ironic articles like this one will continue to appear and women will continue to have a separate movement. ■ are going to do."

While speaking at Carleton last month, Rebick said she supports proportional representation as a better way to reflect women's issues in parliament. There are many types of proportional representation, but it basically means that a citizen votes for a party, not for a candidate. According to Rebick's proposal, each party would be required to be "gender-, racially and regionally balanced" in their choice of proposed candidates. In a representative parliament, the party gets the same percentage of seats as the percentage of votes it receives at the polls.

Rebick says this system would increase voter confidence because MPs would better reflect the interests of their constituencies, meaning better representation for women and minorities as well as better chances for smaller parties.

Vickers also proposes a kind of modified system of proportional representation. She says one option would be a system like that of Germany, where there is a minimum percentage of votes required before you get any seats.

Fumbling, Bumbling and Campbell Crumbling

by David Docking and Stefanka Kirincich
Charlatan Staff

The 1993 election campaign has been a long and winding road.

So, just in case your newspaper subscription ran out or your telly's on the blink, The Charlatan has digested the basic issues and events of the leaders' campaigns covered in the various media.

WEEK I (Sept. 8-11)

The campaign officially begins on Sept. 8 and the hot topic quickly becomes job creation for 1.6 million unemployed Canadians.

Liberal Leader Jean Chrétien pledges a "return to the good old days," promising to revive the economy with massive government spending on public works programs.

Prime Minister Kim Campbell says her priority is to reduce the deficit and once that is done, jobs will come naturally. Unfortunately, this means that Canada's unemployment rate may not drop below 10 per cent until the end of the century, she says.

NDP Leader Audrey McLaughlin reiterates her strategy for job creation. It includes an investment fund to help finance innovative companies, and measures, such as removal of the GST, to trigger consumer spending.

Reform Party Leader Preston Manning begins his campaign by promising to let voters dictate his agenda for the first part of the campaign.

He says Reform sees the debt as a root cause of many of Canada's problems, including high unemployment.

Bloc Québécois Leader Lucien Bouchard says federalism is bad and sovereignty is the only answer for Quebec.

National Party Leader Mel Hurtig files an application for a court injunction to include his party in the television debates on Oct. 3 and 4.

WEEK II (Sept. 12-18)

Chrétien promises to create 1.6 million jobs over four years as he unveils the Liberal economic plan on Sept. 15.

The Liberals take an unusual step by releasing their platform all at once. It promises a national apprenticeship plan, public works projects to build roads and sewers, a three-year plan to provide up to 150,000 new child-care spaces, a head-start education program for aboriginal pre-schoolers as well as grants and bursaries for post-secondary aboriginal students. The plan calls for increased investment for research and development, a new venture capital fund for innovative small businesses, and the cancellation of the multi-billion-dollar military helicopter purchase.

Campbell promises never to criminalize abortion and disavows the abortion bill she supported as justice minister.

McLaughlin promises to support a Liberal minority government if it agrees to kill the free trade agreements. She also accuses the Tories and the Liberals of conspiring with multinational pharmaceutical companies to keep drug prices high.

WEEK III (Sept. 19-25)

Campbell comes under heavy fire when she says an election is no time to talk about Tory plans for social programs. Campbell is also attacked over her reluctance to outline her deficit-cutting plans. She claims government books are in too much of a mess.

Chrétien also stirs up controversy when he tells students at a Newfoundland college he favors experimentation with "workfare" — programs in which welfare recipients must work for their payments. He later clarifies his statement by saying such a system wouldn't necessarily include mandatory work for welfare payments, "but nothing is impossible."

Manning outlines in detail his party's plan to eliminate the $35-billion deficit in three years through cuts to programs including federal transfer payments, unemployment insurance and old-age pensions. The "zero-in-three" plan is given prominent exposure when a Sept. 23 Globe and Mail editorial endorses it, calling it "the only deficit plan we've seen."

In a bid for attention, McLaughlin uses a dinosaur skeleton as a backdrop for an anti-Senate speech at the University of Saskatchewan.

Bouchard promises if the Bloc holds the balance of power, it would only topple a minority government in order to protect Quebec interests.

WEEK IV (Sept. 26-Oct. 2)

Campbell finally outlines her strategy to trim government spending and save $5.85 billion over the next five years. The savings, she says, will come from a freeze in future defence spending and international development assistance, from reducing subsidies to business and through further trimming of spending for government operations. She promises there will be no cuts to health care, education and social assistance.

Chrétien promises to stop the government re-organization Campbell began during the summer. He also promises to scrap the GST and replace it with an unspecified alternative that would generate the same revenue.

On Sept. 26, the parties' TV ads begin. Advertising experts quickly nominate an unusually calm message from Chrétien as the most convincing.

Manning runs into some controversy over Reform's health care platform. He clarifies his party's position by stating that federal health care spending would be kept at current or even increased levels, but he would allow the provinces to charge user fees if they wish.

WEEK V (Oct. 3-9)

There is no clear winner in the Oct. 3 French-language leadership debate on television, though Campbell and Chrétien hold their own, say the pundits.

On Oct. 4, the National Party fails in its bid to get the Supreme Court to force the TV networks to allow Hurtig in the English-language debate to be held that evening.

As in the previous night's debate, no leader makes a major blunder. Chrétien and Manning do particularly well, according to some observers.

Campbell comes under fire on Oct. 6 when the Liberals reveal leaked government documents which give details of her government's plan to privatize two terminals of Pearson International Airport in Toronto. The $1.6 billion deal would transfer control of the terminals to a private consortium of developers with strong links to the Tories.

The plan is called "immoral" by Chrétien, who vows to block it.

Campbell insists the consortium was chosen through public tender and that 14,000 jobs would be lost if the deal was scuttled. The deal is approved by the government on Oct. 7.

Chrétien has his own problems to contend with after an unannounced, exclusive fundraiser in Montreal is reported. News reports say 200 guests paid $1,000 each and were promised private meetings with "the future prime minister." Chrétien defends the cocktail party as an annual fundraising affair, which gives the business elite no special access to him or privilege within his party.

Hurtig says a National Party government would call a referendum on whether Quebec would like to leave Canada.

WEEK VI (Oct. 10-16)

Although she starts strong at the beginning of the week, the PM is forced to pull a campaign ad that caused widespread distaste among the public and fellow Tories. The ad, which depicts Chrétien with crooked mouth and wild eyes, has a voice in the background that asks "Is this a Prime Minister?"

On Oct. 12, Chrétien vows either to cancel or rewrite the Tories' deal to privatize Pearson airport.

Manning warns voters that they shouldn't give Chrétien a blank cheque by awarding the Liberals a majority government. He says a minority parliament with fiscally responsible Reformers holding the balance of power would keep a short leash on the tax-and-spend Liberals.

Like Campbell, Manning finds himself in hot water when the Reform candidate in York Centre makes controversial remarks about immigrants, at one point comparing them to criminals. Manning quickly forces the candidate to withdraw.

McLaughlin offers a three-point medicare guarantee, setting out conditions that must be met for her to support a minority Liberal government. The declaration demands the government restore federal transfer payments for medicare and other social programs to past levels, ban user fees and repeal amendments to the drug patent law.

Sunera Thobani, president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, criticizes the five major parties for ignoring women's issues during the election.

Raven women singing in the rain

Cocky Yeowomen humbled in loss

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

Oh, how sweet it is to watch the mighty fall — particularly when you're not the mighty.

The Carleton women's soccer team defeated the first-place York Yeowomen 3-2 at home on a cold, wet Oct. 17.

The win improves the Ravens' record to 4-3-1 and solidifies their hold on fourth place in the Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletic Association's east division soccer league.

Carleton 3 York 2

"We were really pumped for this game and we really wanted to win as a team," said goalkeeper Kristina Bacchi. "York is a team known to have attitude, to be a very cocky team and we wanted to show them."

Show them they did.

Midfielder Nicole Maynard put Carleton up 1-0, taking advantage of poor York goaltending.

"It was a throw-in and I just turned on it and went to the net," said Maynard. "It hit the post, hit the goalie and went in."

Immediately momentum swung to the Carleton side. Riding that wave, Maynard scored again when she tapped in a cross from the left side.

"The (York) goaltender went across the net and misplayed it. I just put my foot in there and kicked it in," she said.

York closed the gap a minute later and trailed 2-1 at halftime.

"That one goal they got just proved to us that we had to keep not just trying for another goal but defend as well," said Bacchi.

And that's exactly what the Ravens did in the second half. Led by sweeper Ann-Marie Irwin, the Ravens settled into a defensive shell while still striking when the opportunity arose.

Striker Mary McCormick gave Carleton a 3-1 lead and Yeowomen striker Clair Ralston scored her second to close the gap 3-2.

Then Irwin took over clearing the ball away time after time.

Chasing the ball on a crummy day led Carleton to a satisfying 3-2 victory.

"I just like playing in wet conditions," said Irwin. "I just had a lot of good plays."

"She played great," said Bacchi. "She was reading the game very well and she knew exactly when to go and when to tackle. Everytime she tackled someone she got the ball."

Even York coach David Bell was impressed with her play.

"Their sweeper just kept making one great block after another to keep them in the game."

Nowhere was Carleton's defence more apparent than in the dying minutes with York scrambling for a tying goal.

"They were hungry for a goal," said Bacchi. "Those last couple of minutes were really intense. The ball would stop dead (in the mud). People were swinging and missing, and the referee let the game go an extra two minutes so we all started panicking."

Irwin agreed.

"It was just a big mudbath. We were trying to keep it out of our own end because we knew time was almost up and we knew that we could win."

The whistle finally blew. Game over. The Ravens end their season Oct. 24 in Toronto against the third-place Varsity Blues.

Polo men find Toronto to their liking

by Richard G.D. Scott

There were some hot birds in Toronto this past weekend and they were not the Blue Jays.

At the Oct. 16-17 waterpolo tournament at the University of Toronto, the Carleton Ravens made impressive strides towards the final four playoff round next month.

Carleton 5 McMaster 5
Carleton 5 Western 4
Toronto 8 Carleton 4
Carleton 9 York 5

The Ravens posted a 2-1-1 weekend record against strong competition from the universities of York, Western Ontario, Toronto and McMaster, moving into third place in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association waterpolo league.

After losing 19-5 and 11-3 in last season's meetings against McMaster, the Ravens opened their weekend tournament by tying the defending champs 5-5.

Led by an excellent checking performance from holechecker Corry Burke, the Ravens led McMaster from start to finish. But leading 5-4 in the last quarter, the Ravens were robbed of a victory when the referee allowed a controversial McMaster goal in after it sat on the goal line.

"There's no way that ball crossed the line," said Raven coach John Pankiw. The ball must completely cross the line to be counted as a goal.

The Ravens returned to the pool that night to face the Western Mustangs, who Carleton beat for the bronze medal in last year's playoffs. Led by the sparkling goaltending of captain Allemander Pereira, who held the Mustangs scoreless until the 4:40 mark of the third quarter, the Ravens pulled out a 5-4 victory. Burke scored the game winner on a penalty shot.

After the surprising McMaster tie and Western Ontario win, the Ravens were hoping to do the same to the Toronto Blues.

No such luck.

Last year the Blues outscored the Ravens 27-15 in two regular season games. This time around, Toronto doubled up Carleton 8-4.

"There were a lot of stretches that they didn't score (in) and we played right with them," said Pankiw.

The Ravens then finished their weekend with an easier 9-5 victory over the winless York Yeomen. Against the weaker York squad, Carleton played some of their bench players, including goaltender Andy Pohl, who saw his first action this season in the fourth quarter.

The 3-2-1 Ravens are now in third place behind Toronto and McMaster. The Ravens' next match will be an exhibition game against an alumni Carleton team on Oct. 30 and their next league game will be against Queen's on Oct. 31.

Gillick brains behind Jays field success

by Ryan Ward
Charlatan Staff

It's October.

Therefore the Toronto Blue Jays must be in the World Series — again. So let us give credit where credit is due.

Let's thank general manager Pat Gillick for the Blue Jays' success.

In 17 years at the Jays' helm, Gillick has engineered a major-league-record 11 straight winning seasons, five divisional championships, two American League pennants and, so far, one World Series.

Not bad at all. That's a record of success far superior to almost any other modern day general manager.

And what has Pat done?

Year after year Gillick has ensured the Jays remain a contender.

After winning the World Series last year, Gillick replaced half the Jays' 24-man roster.

The key men gone include Winfield, Key, Cone, Henke, Lee, Stieb and Gruber.

In their place, Gillick recruited Molitor, Stewart and Fernandez and promoted Hengten, Sprague and Ward.

Then, to give the Jays an edge in post-season play, Gillick picked up baseball's greatest all-time leadoff hitter Rickey Henderson as this year's rent-a-player.

The newly melded Jays only managed to win their third straight American League east division title and fourth in five years.

Not bad at all.

Thanks to Gillick's astute trading and player development, the Jays were the first team in 100 years to have three players — Roberto Alomar, Paul Molitor and John Olerud — finish 1-2-3 in the batting race.

On top of that, first baseman Olerud only managed to flirt with the .400 mark for most of the season. That's a feat that hasn't been accomplished since Ted Williams of the Boston Red Sox batted .406 in 1941.

Thanks Pat.

And thanks for manager Cito Gaston.

With the Jays floundering at 12-24 early into the 1989 season, Gillick promoted Gaston to the manager's position and has never regretted the decision.

Few people realize how much Gaston has accomplished in so little time — four first-place finishes and one second in five years.

With those results, Gaston's taken too far much flak over the years and his recognition is long overdue.

Only Gillick has stood by him year after year.

Gillick has been the architect. Gillick has been the genius.

Maintaining a contender for over a decade has been his legacy.

Thanks Pat — we look forward to seeing the Jays play in October again next year.

Voyageurs battle Ravens to soccer tie

First-place battle with Toronto next week

by Sarah Richards

Strong, explosive starts are considered an asset by most teams. But for the Carleton men's soccer team, they've been more of a mixed blessing.

Sometimes they relax and settle for a tie. Other times they start quickly and roll to victory.

The former happened in a 1-1 tie against the Laurentian Voyageurs in a home game on Oct. 18, the latter in a severe 5-0 mangling of the York Yeomen on Oct. 19. The 7-0-2 Ravens are now ranked third in the country.

Carleton 1 Laurentian 1
Carleton 5 York 0

"We'll start off the game strong -- the last few... we've been scoring early, then we lay back," said Raven midfielder Ian Rowe after the Laurentian tie.

The moment the whistle blew, the Ravens came out aggressive. A well-positioned give-and-go allowed striker Basil Phillips to take advantage of a sleeping Laurentian defence seven minutes into the game. Laurentian goalkeeper John Kowal said the goal was a result of a defensive mix-up.

"There wasn't a clear understanding of who was doing what."

Now the question remained -- would they relax or would they roll?

It seemed like the answer would be the latter when 15 minutes later, Phillips had a second chance at the net when the Voyageurs left the door wide open for the Raven's offence. His shot went wide.

Nevertheless, the first half was peppered with Raven chances with another good shot coming off a free kick taken by sweeper Michael Zaborski. The ball sailed over an eight-man Laurentian wall, but was tipped over the bar by Kowal.

But come second half, the Ravens lost steam and relaxed.

"Other than Marty Lauter, our defenders couldn't kick it over the (Laurentian) defence today, which is our game," said assistant coach David McFall. "That hurt us, because the ball was getting kicked into midfield, and then Laurentian was winning it."

It was just such a play that allowed a cross from the 18-yard line to meet up with Laurentian striker Tony Giorgio's foot.

"I saw the lob coming, defence was cheating, so I just went on the outside to stay outside. The ball lobbed over, they didn't mark up, so I just put it through the keeper."

Nearing the end of the second half, boot and bash became the Raven's dominant play as Laurentian pressured to score the tie-breaker.

"Communication started to go, and everything started to break apart," said Rowe. "Everyone was screaming at each other in the end, they were just out of control."

In the dying minutes of the game, the Voyageurs came close to marking a second point when they struck the crossbar in Carleton's jammed six-yard box.

"There wasn't a lot of pretty football played today," said Kowal walking off the field after the game.

It was a different story when the Ravens played York the following day. Instead of relaxing and settling for another tie, the Ravens stormed to victory, completely dominating York's weak defence.

Fullback Lauter scored on a cross. Minutes later, Phillips scored on a header past a shell-shocked York defence. With two minutes left in the first half, a small chip by Phillips to forward Marc Baumgartner allowed him to score on a waist-high shot to the left of the net.

And the carnage continued in the second half.

Ravens Zaborski and midfielder Joe Gabor scored a goal each, leaving York empty-handed when the whistle blew. □

Fumble blows Raven win

by Derek DeCloe

If the Carleton Ravens miss the playoffs again this year, they might look back on Oct. 16 as the reason.

Or, the Ravens might simply remember their 25-21 loss to Concordia as the one that got away.

The Ravens seriously jeopardized their chances of making the Ontario-Quebec Intercollegiate Football Conference playoffs blowing a 21-6 third-quarter lead.

The Ravens now must beat the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees in the annual Panda Game Oct. 24 to have any chance of claiming their first playoff berth in six years. They also need a McGill victory at Queen's on Oct. 23. If the Ravens get both, they're in.

Concordia wrapped up their comeback victory in an unusual way. Trailing 21-18 with less than two minutes to play, the Stingers attempted a game-tying field goal — and missed.

Raven Wayne Wilson, the team's leading kick returner, went to scoop it up — and dropped it. Concordia's Mike Noble fell on it for the game-winning touchdown with 1:38 to play.

Game over.

"It wasn't in the cards for us," said Raven coach Donn Smith. "We played our hearts out but it was a real bitter lesson."

Although Wilson dropped the big one, he wasn't the only goat. A pile of Carleton mistakes opened the door for Concordia's comeback.

"I think the guys got a little bit complacent and thought that we'd won the game," said lineman John Merry.

The Ravens should have been able to trap the Stingers in their own end in the fourth quarter, said Smith. But despite having a strong wind behind them, punters Joey Ducharme and Harry Van

1992	0	6	0	44	217	0
1993	2	4	0	91	145	4

As the season progresses, we'll compare this year's Raven squad against the best and worst Raven teams of the past: the 6-1 1986 squad and the 0-7 1992 team.

Hofwegen booted a couple of poor punts and gave Concordia good field position for the final drive.

On the positive side, Carleton finally showed some scoring spark after two weeks of lacklustre offence. Ray Hubbert started for the first time at quarterback and threw two touchdown passes. He was 10 for 29 with 136 yards.

This year's Panda fight will be especially meaningful because both Carleton and Ottawa are 2-4 and fighting for the last playoff spot in the O-QIFC.

"There's a great deal of optimism," said defensive back Jason Mallett. "There's no question that this Panda game probably means more to us than any game in the past couple of years. We'll be on fire for that game."

Of course, Carleton's playoff hopes will have already vanished by kickoff if Queen's beats McGill.

"We don't like to look at it that way, and I don't think there are many guys looking at it like that," said Merry. "We gotta get two points."

Smith meanwhile, just hopes for a week with as little distraction as possible. "We're a young, gullible team easily influenced by distractions," he said.

And that's the last thing the Ravens need for Panda. □

BRIEFS

The Carleton swim team hosted and lost their own relay exhibition meet on Oct. 16 against the University of Ottawa and Queen's. The women's team lost 154-48 to Queen's and 161-41 to Ottawa.

The men's team did slightly better, losing 126-75 to Queen's and 143-78 to Ottawa.

The Raven men's basketball team hosted and lost their annual alumni game on Oct. 16 at the Ravens' Nest. The alumni team, led by Alex Overwijk's 20 points, defeated the varsity squad 80-61. James Marquardt led the Ravens with 29 points.

Bumpers on Bank Street will be holding a wing-eating contest on Thursday, Oct. 21, at 8 p.m., involving six Carleton Raven football players, six Ottawa Gee-Gees and six Ottawa Rough Riders. A $1 cover charge will go to the Children's Hospital of Eastern Ontario.

Carleton's radio station, CKCU 93.1, will be broadcasting this year's Panda Game between the Carleton Ravens and the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees football clubs. Air time is 2:45 p.m. on Sunday, Oct. 24.

Weird and wacky mind games

by Jay Tharayil
Charlatan Staff

Jekyll and Hyde.

That's the best way to describe the effect mental preparation has in transforming Carleton student Chris Coulter from an everyday scholar to a tight-end for the Carleton Ravens football team.

"You're totally focused," he says. "If there's a spot on the wall, you totally focus on that spot. You look at it, but you're really looking past it, trying to get your mind totally free of everything except your job and what you have to do."

By preparing himself mentally, Coulter allows Mr. Hyde to emerge and change his entire personality.

"You just get into this vicious mindset that you're going to kill someone. If you don't get into that vicious mindset, you're going to get bowled over."

Concentration. Psyching up. Focus.

Those are the buzz words for the process Coulter and a thousand other athletes go through before each and every game.

But everyone does it differently. Some athletes foreshadow game situations in their minds. Others work themselves into a state of frenzy. Some, like Coulter, focus their thoughts on a single thought or emotion. And still others just try to relax and ignore the pressures of the coming game.

But all athletes, in some way, mentally prepare themselves.

And this intense concentration is not something athletes strive for just before games. It's something that's instilled by coaches continuously during weekly training sessions and throughout a long season.

"It's just like a train," says Coulter of the process. "It starts out slow, but by the end of the week, it's going full speed."

Marg Jones is the coach of the women's basketball team. She says mental preparation is key to success on the court.

"If you have no doubt, if you've gone through the situation in practice, your confidence level goes up and it allows you to play at your best."

That concentration is a two-way street, says Jones. It's the coach's responsibility to ensure players are strategically prepared for the game. But it's also an athlete's responsibility to get themselves focused.

Towards that goal, Raven basketball guard Erin O'Grady arrives early at the gym before each game.

It's in this time period she thinks of fundamentals, of what the coaching staff said, and what the coach expects of the team in that game.

While some coaches like Jones take a passive approach to mental preparation, others are more aggressive.

Raven fencing coach James Ireland insists each of his athletes listen to relaxation tapes for 15 minutes each night.

These tapes consist of exercises which induce athletes to remain calm while competing.

One of these exercises is the creation of a suggestion word that athletes can repeat to themselves when they are nervous in order to remain calm.

Although Ireland has confidence in the methods he employs, he is quick to point out the danger of putting too much faith in mental preparation.

"Sports psychology does not guarantee you are going to be the best at something," he says. "It guarantees, that when you need it, you are going to be the best you can be."

Ireland also says each athlete is unique, and should be treated as such.

"Everyone is different. Our system is designed behind the belief that everyone is individually developed. It caters to peoples' differences."

Different people. Different methods of mental preparation. It doesn't matter what you do -- as long as it works. □

Rugby Ravens one win away from playoffs

Defence closes the door on Blues' offence

by Matt Shurrie

At least Toronto can be proud of its professional baseball team.

At home on Oct. 16, the 4-1 Carleton Ravens dumped the 3-2 University of Toronto Varsity Blues 25-6, closing the door on any Toronto rugby playoff dreams.

Carleton 25 Toronto 6

With the victory, the Ravens improve to an impressive 5-1 and remain tied for first with the Laurier Golden Hawks in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's second rugby division.

If the Ravens win their game against the 1-5 Trent Excalibur this weekend, it will clinch them first place because the Ravens defeated the 5-1 Laurier Golden Hawks 12-7 on Sept. 18.

"The club came out slow off the mark, and they continued to shoot themselves in the foot with mental mistakes," said coach Lee Powell, commenting on a slow Carleton start. "However, the club turned it up a notch and showed me the way they can really play in the second half."

The first half was a struggle of sloppy ball control and ineffective passing. Only a strong, stand-tall defence held an imposing Toronto offence in check.

At halftime, the clubs were tied at six.

But in the second half, a completely different Raven team appeared. Passing was executed to perfection, ball control improved and the defence remained — not giving up any second-half points.

Kicker Mike Rys was a force as usual.

TIM O'CONNOR

The turning point of the game occurred early in the second half when second-row Jason Hann broke a few tackles and scored a try, increasing the Ravens' lead to a more comfortable 13-6 score.

Defence again stood out, limiting the Blues to only two penalty kicks.

Both flanker Dennis Djonlich and rookie outside-centre Rick Haldane had stand-out games at defence. Haldane especially looked like a man on a mission, showing off perfect blocking techniques.

"(We've) really developed since our first game of the season, with the backs and forwards settling into position," said kicker Mike Rys, commenting on the team's defensive play.

"The club's success is based on skill, performance and attitude. This bunch of guys has really worked hard to improve each game, and they deserve everything they have earned," said Powell.

Wet Panda a friendly splash

Sailing club defeats Ottawa in regatta

by Shannon Fraser

Competitive yet friendly.

That was the atmosphere surrounding the first Wet Panda Regatta between Carleton University and the University of Ottawa hosted and won by the Carleton sailing club at the Britannia Yacht Club on a cold, wet and windy Oct. 16.

In sailing competitions, different types of boats enter different classes. In this regatta, Carleton entered three boats in the 420 class and placed first in all five races.

Ottawa lost.

Carleton sailor Dave Nurse won four of five races in the laser class, losing only the first race when he false-started.

Ottawa lost.

Ottawa was unable to field a full boat in the echo class and a combination Carleton/Ottawa crew defeated a second Carleton crew.

"That worked really well," said Carleton sailor Gordon Dewis, about the shared win. "Adam (Voisin) was a very good sailor."

Voisin, an U of O sailor on the combination team, was equally pleased with the way the race turned out.

"It doesn't matter who I'm sailing with," he said. "It was fun anyway."

This sense of kinship was the theme for the Wet Panda Regatta.

"I hope they do this again next year," said Carleton sailor Jonathan Hirst. "I know I'll be back. It's good there's a lot of camaraderie even though you're supposed to be school against school."

Race organizers Nurse and Gyllaum Godbout of Ottawa U hope to make the Wet Panda Regatta an annual event.

"Next year we'll cream Carleton," said Godbout with a laugh, reflecting on Ottawa's second- and last-place finish.

Injuries sink Ravens

by Kevin Restivo

One win. Two losses. Three injuries. The Carleton women's field hockey team ran their winless streak to eight games in Montreal, losing 8-0 to the University of Toronto Blues on Oct. 15 and losing 6-0 to the York Yeowomen on Oct. 16.

That streak was finally broken with a 4-1 victory over the Trent Excalibur later that afternoon at McGill Field.

Toronto 8 Carleton 0
York 6 Carleton 0
Carleton 4 Trent 1

During the weekend, three players also went down with injuries. Forward Vicki Wilcox suffered a knee injury and is out for the year. Goaltender Julie Suds reinjured her back and defender Christina Matula was carted off to the Montreal General Hospital after getting hit above the left eye.

"It was a little bit tough at this time of the year with so many injuries to deal with," said assistant coach Sandy Roy. "Considering all the changes we made and all the injuries, the girls really handled it remarkably and played quite well under those conditions."

Against Toronto, the Ravens came out fired up and actually held the 14-0 Blues scoreless through the first 10 minutes of the game. Forward Vicki Wilcox then went down with a knee injury and after a long delay the Ravens followed suit. While defending, Wilcox partially tore her left anterior ligament, the spot behind her knee, when she planted her left foot and turned at the same time to make a tackle. Even if Wilcox had continued to play, versatile midfielder Suzanne Bird doubted it would have made a difference.

"Even when we're playing our game, a team like Toronto, which has almost half the national team players, seems to force their game on us," said Bird.

Carleton's contest against 10-1-2 York Yeowomen was a carbon copy of their Toronto loss.

This time the tide shifted when Raven goalie Julie Suds left the game with back spasms and defender Christina Matula was hit in the head with an errant shot..

"We're not normally expected to beat teams like York," said a frustrated Wilson, "but when you've got players where they normally aren't (supposed to be) it makes it next to impossible."

Still, Carleton went into their match against the 0-11 Trent Excalibur with an upbeat attitude.

"The girls worked hard in both games and that carried over into our game against Trent. We knew we could compete with them. They have the same type of team as us," said coach Suzanne Nicholson.

Once again, the Ravens came out firing on all cylinders.

Bird opened the game with a hat trick and Carleton never looked back. Rookie forward Amanda Mullin capped off the scoring for Carleton with a second-half goal.

Carleton ends their season on the road with games against the fourth-place Waterloo Athenas on Oct. 22, the third-place Guelph Gryphons on Oct. 23, and the sixth-place Western Mustangs Oct. 24. □

NATURAL LAW PARTY

Creating a Perfect Government that Will Prevent All Problems and Satisfy Everyone

“Election is the time to create a better government.

“The best government is Nature’s Government — Natural Law — which governs our universe with perfect order and without a problem.

“Natural Law governs all life from the galaxies to our solar system to our planet earth, and certainly our individual lives are also governed by Natural Law.

“I have the knowledge to bring the support of Natural Law to my dear Canadians and my dear Canada.

“I will establish a group of 7,000 experts who will practice Transcendental Meditation and Yogic Flying. This group will radiate positivity and harmony throughout the nation and create a unified national consciousness.

Dr. Neil Paterson
Party Leader
Candidate for Ottawa-Centre
Custodian of the Constitution of the Universe
Ambassador of the Government of Nature

“Then national life will be in harmony with Natural Law, and every Canadian will enjoy peace, happiness, and prosperity.

“I have the scientific knowledge to create a government as efficient as the Government of Nature. I will create a flourishing economy and a problem-free nation.

“Our dear Canada was founded on ‘principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law.’

“The Natural Law Party is the only party that can fulfill this supreme aspiration and create a government that functions in accord with Natural Law, which is the Will of God.

“With the full support of Natural Law, we will create a perfect government that can satisfy everyone.”

— Dr. Neil Paterson

Winning Points of the Natural Law Party Our Proven Solutions to National Problems

ECONOMY

All problems of the economy are basically problems of lack of creativity. The Natural Law Party will enliven the infinite organizing power of Natural Law in national consciousness and awaken the inner creative genius of every Canadian. This will generate economic optimism, job growth, and national prosperity.

JOBS

Unemployment demonstrates the failure of the government to organize national activity. We will rapidly reduce unemployment through:
1. increased creativity and lower taxes to sustain economic growth; 2. creating new jobs at home and abroad — reconstructing and beautifying the nation; increasing production and export; 3. more years in education; 4. more interesting and effective job training, with special care for dropouts; 5. a little shorter working day for all; 6. making it possible for mothers to enjoy the comfort of home and nourish the coming generation, rather than getting tired at work; 7. special commissions comprising business leaders, engineers, and other professionals, to design programs that will create high employment.

DEFICIT

Eliminate the national deficit in three years by saving the federal government $57 billion annually through eliminating problems; disallow future governments from indebting the nation; invite ministers of past governments to find means to repay the national debt they created.

TAX

Immediately abolish GST; gradually reduce personal and corporate income taxes as expenditures are reduced; simplify the tax system to eliminate waste of national resources in collecting and disbursing taxes.

HEALTH

Reduce disease by 50% in three years through Maharishi Ayur-Ved — prevention-oriented natural health care — saving Canada $35 billion yearly and preventing a great deal of suffering.

EDUCATION

Unfold the full creative genius of every student through Maharishi’s Transcendental Meditation and TM-Sidhi program, while developing the skills necessary for professional success; study and research in consciousness to develop higher consciousness so that everyone lives in harmony with Natural Law — life free from mistakes and suffering.

ENVIRONMENT

Create a pollution-free nation through pollution-free industries, energy, and transportation; education for higher consciousness to prevent violation of Natural Law — the basis of all pollution.

AGRICULTURE

Promote profitable, sustainable agriculture to produce natural, healthy, organically grown food; bring every farmer the full support of Natural Law — on the level of the soil, seed, crops, and seasons to ensure abundant yields.

LAW AND JUSTICE

Simplify the legal system; eliminate the basis of crime — stress in the individual and society; introduce proven rehabilitation programs that reduce recidivism and train offenders to act spontaneously in accord with Natural Law.

CULTURAL INTEGRITY

Uphold the social, cultural, and religious traditions in every area, while ensuring the perpetual unity of our ten provinces.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Improve the health and well-being of our seniors so they fully enjoy life, while their families and communities benefit from their wise guidance; bring peace to our dear elders by eliminating the problems of our nation and creating a government that will disallow problems from arising.

FAMILY VALUES

Create an upsurge of happiness, stability, and harmony in family life by enlivening bliss and harmony in national consciousness.

DECENTRALIZATION OF ADMINISTRATION

Give more authority and power to local governments to prevent problems; when local problems are prevented, national problems will never arise.

A GROUP FOR A GOVERNMENT

Bring the full support of Natural Law to Canada by establishing A Group for A Government — 7,000 Yogic Flyers — who will enliven the Unified Field of Natural Law, creating coherence, positivity, and harmony in national consciousness.

ALL-PARTY GOVERNMENT

Form an all-party government that engages the greatest experts, irrespective of party, to run the government; bring efficiency to every department of the government and satisfaction to all Canadians.

DEFENCE

Create invincible defence by establishing a group of 7,000 Yogic Flyers to generate coherence and harmony in collective consciousness, thereby preventing the birth of an enemy — internal enemy: stress, economic depression and debt, low productivity, dissatisfaction, sickness and suffering, and separatism threatening the nation’s integrity; and external enemy: infiltration of crime from our neighbour and overseas. In the absence of integrated national and world consciousness, the possibility of war or invasion can never be ruled out.

“I see the stability and progress of Canada only through the government of the Natural Law Party. I invite my people of Canada to listen to my alarm call to the nation. There is still time for voters to understand the scientifically validated programs of the Natural Law Party, and to understand that there is no other party which can prevent problems from arising. Truly, there is no other party with the knowledge to create a perfect government, as effective and efficient as the Government of the Universe. I am saying this from the platform of science. My dear Canadians, I invite you not to lose this chance of creating a perfect government through the Natural Law Party.”
Dr. Neil Paterson

Over 500 scientific studies performed at 215 research institutions in 27 countries validate the programs of the Natural Law Party for improving all aspects of individual and national life.

Local bands stage excellent show

Pogo-a-Gogo Rock-a-Roo 4
Porter Hall
Oct. 16

If you missed it (and if you were over 17 you probably did), Songbird Music held its fourth Pogo-a-Gogo Rock-a-Roo music fest this past Saturday in Porter Hall. Performing were local bands Fishtales, Heaven Dog, Tongues and Bones and Black Triangle.

I arrived roughly 40 minutes before the doors opened, hoping to trap the ever-elusive co-organizer Tom Stewart for a brief interview on the evening's events. This poor individual didn't pause for an instant from the moment I walked through the doors. Once I finally managed to confront him, Tom happily brought me backstage to a less noisy venue for the interview.

According to Stewart, Pogo-a-Gogo originated in the minds of the people at Songbird Music, who wished to create a large all-ages show with local talent. It's designed to make up for the lack of all-ages shows in Ottawa, and to do so in a really large way with good equipment and lots of people attending.

Stewart says he feels Pogo-a-Gogo has had a good effect on the local scene, and that it's an important event, with the possible upcoming loss of the SAW Gallery as an all-ages venue.

My last impression, before the show started, was Stewart running madly about the hall searching for the switch to turn off the main lights. Interesting prelude to what was an excellent show.

The first band to perform was Fishtales. They've already released their second album, Ulysses, and can they perform. Their music radiated a positive and happy state of sonic bliss. They even owned that much treasured set of special effects, the strobe light/smoke machine combo. Their 40-minute set showcased a wide spread of styles.

Maybe it was because they were the first band, or perhaps the crowd was mellowed by the smoothness of the music, but there was relatively no dancing. At most, some people shook their heads and moved from side to side.

A few times the band exhorted the crowd, "Don't be afraid to dance." Their wish was fulfilled best when they performed "Untitled." A great set and good opening band.

Heaven Dog was the second Fire! Fire!

band to perform, and before long they had the crowd up and moving. They played songs off their current release, Holy Cow, and even gave the audience a few hits from their upcoming CD.

The highlights of their set were their pleas to use Fishtales' smoke machine and strobe (which they didn't get) and some reflections on the eighties marked by their set-ending cover of A-ha's great pop hit "Take On Me." A driving mosh with guest appearances from the lead singer made for a good time.

Up next was Tongues and Bones. They played an interesting set with lots of keyboard fun. The crowd, however, seemed to have been spoiled by the punk action of Heaven Dog and many people just sat and listened to the less aggressive music. The performance was decent, but was not enough for the audience.

What can one say about a performance by Black Triangle? Perhaps they said it best themselves with the promise of 20 songs in 40 minutes. One moment I felt as if I was at a Dead Kennedys concert, the next at a Celtic rock recital.

This band melds distorted punk rhythms and a frenetic violin, and all you want to do is roll around merrily in the mosh, which is exactly what happened.

In order to keep their promise, they played their songs back to back, stopping only for minor guitar adjustments. Even then, the drums and base pounded on, keeping the crowd busy. Saved for last for a reason, Black Triangle is a must see.

The fourth Pogo-A-Gogo Rock-A-Roo was quite a success. The crowd was good-sized, appreciative of what it saw, and the music was fantastic.

Hopefully Songbird will continue to sponsor this event, allowing Ottawa to maintain regular access to a well-managed all-ages show. □

I Had A Job I Liked. Once.
Great Canadian Theatre Company
Oct. 13— Oct. 30

Not having been to a play in a while, it was a little unusual experiencing the intimacy and well, liveness of a stage play again.

I found myself fighting the urge to turn up the sound or flip the channels all the time. Not that I really had to. Author Guy Vanderhaeghe's first stage effort is fairly entertaining stuff.

The play is centred around RCMP Sgt. Finestad, an aging, tired cop becoming disillusioned with his life as it starts to unravel in small town Saskatchewan in 1967.

The story is about a highly political case of an alleged sexual assault on the daughter of an influential local politician. The suspect in the case is Les Grant, a kid from a troubled working class family. The case makes Finestad more aware of the realities of his job, raising questions about corruption and his own faith in the law.

While the play isn't as heavy as it may sound, the theme of the law does tend to dominate things. Finestad is likeable but seems a little too preoccupied and philosophical for a cop of his temperament and experience. On the other hand, it is a play and total realism is best experienced by hanging out in a real police station somewhere.

There are some other problems here also. None of the characters are totally original. These include the standard stuck-up bitch and her rich father, the poor Canadian kid with an attitude, and the aging but tough gravel-voiced cop.

On the plus side, while the entire play is limited to the confines of Finestad's office and the same props are used throughout, effective staging and lighting and use of music keep things from becoming dull.

For a first time effort, I Had a Job I Liked. Once. is pretty good entertainment. It has some flaws but a live performance has merits on its own. And hey, it's better than television. □ of being one who is enthralled about listening to the same drum machine beating continuously throughout 20 songs, I entered level-headed and willing to open my mind to the concept Yucatan's Liquor Stand had to offer.

Tuesday nights seem to be a popular and attractive night to university-aged students who are trying to stretch out their OSAP loans. The beer and mixed drinks at $2.25 were pretty cheap and if you can make it through the one dollar cover charge, the night is in the palm of your hands.

By 11 o'clock, the venue was crowded. The bartenders were hustling away pouring drinks, opening bottles. It was reminiscent of Santa's elves on the night before Christmas, scurrying around to ensure the children's happiness.

The walls of this establishment are quite cleverly decorated. Abstract objects hang from the ceiling while complimentary junk art is pasted to the walls. With more standing than sitting room, club-goers mingled, tried to pick each other up, attempted to find their soulmates, and rekindle friendships from their past years of school.

Being a pick-up joint, Yucatan's is kinda cheezy, but not as cheezy as the ones you'd find in Hull.

Fashion-wise, it's not the place to go without putting on your face. Most of the girls were decked out in those trendy styles: jeans, with either black or white fitted shirts, cowboy boots or brand new Doc Martens.

A few grungies could be found in their Le Château stripes or Gap plaid shirts. This social group could be spotted easily while the DJ spun the Pearl Jam CD and "Even Flow" came crashing out from the speakers, in between club-hell songs "Rhythm is a Dancer" and "Jump Around."

Yucatan's also boasts full-customer service. An employee, dressed like Bozo the Clown, complete with a sequined shirt, striped satin top hat and unbearable shoes, provided a photo service. Kind of a "If you can't remember what you did the night before, we'll help you." His Polaroid was kept busy, taking pictures mostly of drunken women. Quite the deal for four bucks, methinks. Or maybe not.

In the midst of the evening, a buzzing screech filled the air. This sound would be familiar to residence folk, but Yucatan's patrons paid little attention to the fire alarm as it buzzed for over 10 minutes. Nobody left. The few who noticed this annoying sound simply took a few steps away, where the less-than-pleasant tone could be avoided. In the end, it turned out to be a false alarm.

So if you and your pals are looking to hang out at a drinking establishment and if you like the pick-up scene and lotsa mind-numbing dance music, your search may be over. Have a beer. If you don't like the music, have another beer. Have fun, but don't forget about those classes Wednesday morning. □

Pearson biography complete but boring

The Worldly Years: The Life of Lester Pearson 1949-1972

John English Vintage Books
393 pages
$14.50

The latest biography of Lester Pearson, Canada's fourteenth prime minister and the man they named Mike's Place after, seems to be yet another attempt by an author to harken back to the so-called "good-old days," when jobs were plentiful and hope sprung eternal.

With a federal election only days away, many Canadians wax nostalgic for the Pearson era. Author John English taps into this feeling by portraying Pearson - the Nobel Peace Prize winner and popular prime minister -- as a giant among Canadians.

English begins the book with Pearson's post as minister of external affairs in the late 1940s and most of the 1950s. It follows the successes and failures, his election to the leadership of the Liberal party in 1958, his rise to the prime ministership in 1963 and the trials of his government.

English's book is a masterpiece of research. The biography is an impressive barrage of numbers, dates, cabinet meetings and papers. For example, English has obtained private letters and documentation which paint a convincing picture of Pearson's diplomatic negotiations.

However, English's book fails to inspire readers, or to give them a reason to keep reading. English hovers around the edge of Pearson's personal and political life but seems unable to make the reader feel Pearson's persona in the book. English seems unable to penetrate Pearson's inner thoughts, visions or beliefs. If it wasn't for a library of research, English wouldn't have much to go on.

English's overwhelming body of facts also keeps the reader from enjoying this biography. Because the text is so full of information, the writing is awkward and difficult to follow.

For example, English spends 30 pages describing in great detail the French president Charles De Gaulle's visit to Canada in 1967, when he shouted "Vive le Quebec libre."

The formal negotiations over arranging De Gaulle's visit are greatly detailed. However, the details don't go beyond the formal statements of the various governments involved. There is no sense of what Pearson thought of De Gaulle and there are no personal anecdotes dealing with this period. The technical details bog down the reader's interest.

English attempts to portray Pearson as a hero, doing his best for Canada and the world.

There is no question that Pearson made errors and bungled several policy matters during his political career. English does mention these, including Pearson's disastrous first budget. However, he justifies and makes excuses for Pearson's mistakes. Pearson hardly needs English to defend his historical image.

If you're looking for dates or names for a research essay, this book will suffice. If you're looking for an enjoyable biography, this book's not for you. As someone who wasn't around during Pearson's political career, this biography doesn't help me understand him much better. □

Music from the past enters the future

by Prema Oza

Pandit Hariprasad Chaurasia
Museum of Civilization Theatre
Oct. 16

Pandit Hariprasad Chaurasia, the internationally acclaimed flautist, played before a breathless, packed theatre Saturday night.

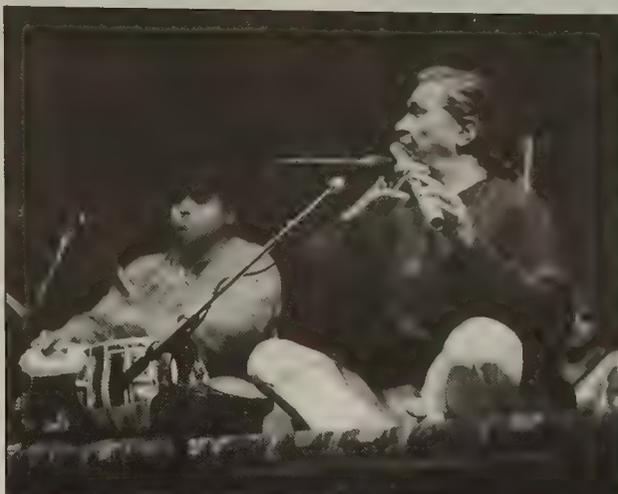

As one of India's foremost classical Indian artists and contemporary master of the bamboo flute, or bansuri, as it is known in Northern India, Chaurasia sees the future of classical Indian music as a strong one.

"The future is bright. It is really wonderful. It's not like the olden days when there were very few audiences," says Chaurasia. "Nowadays, you'll find (the theatres) very crowded. More people listen to classical music and they enjoy it."

However, he does perceive the need to deter young minds from the soundtrack songs of contemporary mainstream Indian cinema, where music is most accessible, most popular and least inspirational.

"We don't get any historical movies any more like Mughal-E-Azam or Anarkali, so we don't get that kind of music with a classical base. We must approach producers to make these kind of movies so that we will have this classical base."

Chaurasia, a native of Uttar Pradesh in Northern India, was accompanied by sitar, tambura (which is like a mini sitar in appearance) and tabla (drums). The tablas were played by Subhankar Banerjee of

If this was Lolapalooza, people would be crowd surfing.

Calcutta, an accomplished musician in his own right.

The performance began with a romantic, evening raga. A raga is a melodic form of music which follows very strict guidelines. The evening performance featured Northern and Southern Indian ragas.

"The basic melodies are improvised with the structure of skill, like jazz," Chaurasia says of the ragas.

An example of this would be the tail end of the performance, where Banerjee and Chaurasia engaged in a bit of "call and response," a popular jazz technique.

As the music penetrated the auditorium, I felt transported back to my native homeland. Back to my parents' farm in Northern India, watching the cattle return home from the fields before a soothing Rajasthanian sunset. The performance was stirring, and served as an inspirational reminder that there is more to music than synthesizers and mass production. More than a grunge guitarist playing guitar in a masturbatory manner... much, much more.

Among Chaurasia's major influences are Indian vocalists and other musicians, both Eastern and Western.

"Musicians who play jazz, rock and pop music also influence me," says Chaurasia.

The flautist, who was introduced as a "legend of his time," sees music as devotion to God.

Religion aside, this man is truly blessed.

The music wafted from the wooden instrument with all the peace and tranquility of a lotus flower. I soon noticed the audience take what could only be considered a collective sigh as they eased into their chairs.

Seeing Chaurasia in action, it is not difficult to see how he acquired his fame. I pitied the tabla player who, although quite good, had difficulty keeping up with the elder and more accomplished Chaurasia and was therefore subjected to the occasional blank stare from him. The audience seemed to find this rather amusing.

The award-winning virtuoso, who has studied under such lauded musicians as Annapurna Devi, offers this advice to struggling, young musicians: in order to be a good performer, you must first be a good listener. □

Gilmour's newest novel a good read

by Derek DeCloet
Charlatan Staff

An Affair With the Moon

David Gilmour
Random House
$18.50
201 pages

Like his last two novels, David Gilmour's latest work is not for the faint of heart.

Gilmour caused a stir two years ago with How Boys See Girls, the story of a man's obsessive love for a younger woman. The book is laced with graphic descriptions of sexual fantasies and masturbation.

An Affair With the Moon is not likely to cause as much controversy although they're both from the same mold. It gives the same straightforward, realistic descriptions that readers have come to expect from Gilmour.

In short, if you're turned on by flowery metaphors and intricately crafted literary devices, forget this book. Those elements are there, but in very limited quantities.

Instead, this book's appeal lies in its ability to deliver the straight goods, a down-in-the-trenches look at what life is really like. No sugar coating here.

The story is told through the eyes of Christian Blackwood, a part-time teacher and full-time alcoholic and drug user. It's a story about a friendship that goes awry when his friend Harrow Winncup murders someone.

Blackwood is a well-formed, believable character, but the story suffers at first from his emphasis on dialogue with other characters. It's not until later, when we begin to see a more reflective Blackwood, that we begin to understand what makes him tick.

However, this slow development is not as burdensome as it might seem. It's actually a nice reflection of Blackwood's transformation into a sober, successful television arts critic. That transformation is slow, but tantalizingly so.

This, though, brings about another problem: the book bills itself badly.

The back cover lauds it as the story of the relationship between Blackwood and his longtime friend Winncup.

But while the bizarre tale of their friendship is constant, the better (though more subtle) story is Blackwood's emergence as a heroic figure in the aftermath of the murder.

Perhaps it's modesty that keeps Gilmour from promoting Blackwood's internal development more. Gilmour, a CBC film critic, has admitted that the book is very autobiographical.

Winncup is also a believable character, and disturbingly so. He's corrupt and detestable, a manipulative drug-addict who shares a strange bond with Blackwood. Sometimes they loathe each other, sometimes they don't, but they never show real compassion for each other.

Perhaps that is just Gilmour's ugly interpretation of real life. He's been critical of the Canadian writing community for failing to deal with real issues and relationships in a realistic way, and won't be caught doing the same.

Having said that, there are two relationships that are underdeveloped and unsatisfying.

The first is Blackwood's relationship with his ex-wife, Kalie. It's ambiguous throughout, and though a reader may be rooting for a reconciliation, it's still in doubt at the end.

The other is Blackwood's relationship with Florence Winncup, Harrow's mother. Gilmour keeps hammering away on their hatred for each other, but scarcely illustrates why.

While this book is refreshingly low on sentimentality, Gilmour uses emotion well. This is especially true of Blackwood's relationship with his son Jesse, who lives with Kalie. It's a brilliantly used motif, sprinkled throughout the story.

In sum, An Affair with the Moon is less daring than Gilmour's past works, but still rewarding. Just don't go looking for sugar. □ his was a very unusual spot to have a concert. The Congress Centre is a rather posh location, more suitable for business meetings or perhaps a political rally for the Conservative Party.

The wall-to-wall carpeting would have been nice on bare toes but was not really suitable for Dr. Martens. However, the tuxedo-clad bartenders were a nice touch, even if they did clash with the sea of plaid-on-plaid.

Not only was it the most unlikely location for the Stone Temple Pilots' concert, but the room's acoustics were terrible. The sound was either swallowed by the carpet or distorted by the dozens of chandeliers on the ceiling. A lousy location to say the least.

The opening band, Boston's Mighty Mighty Bosstones were excellent; even taking into account the horrible location. They're an eight-piece band and they play a variety of instruments, including two saxs and a trombone. Their sound resembles Fishbone's earlier music. They have two lead singers both with a very different style of singing. The first — dressed head to toe in plaid — sounded like he was singing through a voice box. The second — dressed in a tux — was a bit more melodic. The combo produced a funky ska set. A terrific band definitely worth checking out next time they're up this way.

The Pilots were not nearly as impressive as the opening band. The light show could have been topped by most high school dances — they had maybe five different colored lights and way too much smoke.

Half of the time the instruments were turned up so loud that they drowned out Scott Weiland's vocals. The overall sound quality was garbage. The music was loud and distorted at the best of times.

To give the band credit, they did perform a few songs really well. They did a slow version of their hit "Sex Type Thing" that was amazing. They immediately followed it with the same song, only this time they played the faster album version. It was a nice touch.

Their big hit "Plush" was exciting to see live, but like the rest of the songs, it was very distorted.

The San Francisco band, accused by some of being an Alice In Chains/Pearl Jam ripoff, tried far too hard to sound hardcore. Weiland danced around the mike stand as if he were possessed. This would have been fine if it was even the slightest bit believable. The entire routine looked and sounded like an act, and a poor one at that.

Most people can appreciate a band attempting to connect with the fans. The fans at this show were absolutely nuts. The pit was jumping long before any band hit the stage. But Weiland's idea of becoming one with his audience was: "Take care of each other cause we're all brothers and sisters out there," almost exactly like Eddie Vedder's sanctity of life speech at Lollapalooza II. Anyways, he sounded anything but sincere.

Overall the show was pretty bad. The lights were bad, the sound was bad, the room was bad and Weiland looked like a fake. If not for the great crowd and the Mighty Mighty Bosstones, the evening would have been a complete writeoff.

Weiland summed up the Stone Temple Pilots' performance best when he said, "Anyone with drugs gets a free backstage pass!" That may explain the lousy show, but who knows, eh? □

Black Boot Trio CD release party
Zaphod Beeblebrox
Oct. 16

shout from the crowd started the show.

"I want to buy a CD!"

"I'd like to apologize about that," Steve Fai, Black Boot Trio's singer, said smiling. Thanks to Federal Express's bumbling, copies of Pony Ride, the group's new, still-long-awaited CD, were "somewhere between here and Montreal," as the trio held their CD release party. So Fai spent that afternoon assembling cassette packages for impatient fans.

Fai, Stef Bennett, who is credited as playing "drums and power tools" on the album, and bassist John Kanakis put on a kick-ass show, mixing songs off Pony Ride and their "Everthing's Gonna Be Alright" cassette of two years ago.

Again, the group focuses on fast, growling songs about drinking, love/hate and murder, as if sung by a young, electric guitar-playing Johnny Cash. Spending four months from June to September recording Pony Ride sure has paid off in terms of how tight and professional the group sounds, both on the album and on stage.

"Bertie" featured a wicked guitar riff with all the power of gunning the engine of a '71 Buick Skylark with no muffler (trust me on this, I know).

Fai, from the prairie town of Bienfait, still has a lot of that Western Canadian angst to work out. "Kitty" is an apocalyptic, seedy tale of a woman's bus ride to Regina and visit to the Hotel Saskatchewan bar.

At the show, Fai dedicated "14-Foot Trail" (which will be on the CD after Pony Ride) to "fellow Saskatchewan refugees."

Furnaceface guitarist Pat Banister and his pal Shane Smith hopped on stage to play a mean game of paddy-cake, sort of, and sing backing vocals on "Drinking Too Much." Banister also does backing vocals on the recorded version.

Fai introduced one song, saying mockingly that Garth Brooks was going to record it on his next CD and make him a rich man.

The trio encored with "Everything Is Gonna Be Alright." A long-time close friend of the group, as he jumped and danced around the floor, accidentally dropped a beer glass and shattered it, adding to the country/punk texture of the song.

The group ended the show with a rollicking cover of Lou Reed's "Rock 'n' Roll Heart." Despite Kanakis's disclaimer, "Stef and I are doing this against our wills," it had all the campy, playful energy of Fun For Malakai's versions of "Black Cars" or "Stayin' Alive."

So, with all good things, the slightly premature party celebrating Pony Ride's release was worth the wait. □

Demolition Man Directed by Marco Brambilla ell, it's about time. A nice, quiet Oscar winner from Sly Stallone.

Right, and I'm Gene Siskel. The year is 1996. Los Angeles is a gang-controlled wasteland, where fear and chaos rule.

Stallone plays LAPD Lt. John Spartan who, while attempting to arrest the sadistically violent Simon Phoenix (played by Wesley Snipes) during a hostage stand-off, apparently botches the rescue and all 30 hostages are killed.

Phoenix and Spartan, as punishment, are sentenced by the state to be "reprogrammed" and frozen for 75 years in cryogenic suspension, with no chance of parole for 50 years.

Jump to 2032. The city is now San Angeles, a merger of Los Angeles, San Francisco and San Diego. San Angeles is a docile and peaceful society where crime is unheard of. All "bad" things, including chocolate, sex, beer and profanity have been outlawed.

At his own parole hearing, Phoenix, a martial arts expert, escapes from the SAPD cryogenic prison facility into the tranquil streets of San Angeles and begins a violent and murderous rampage. Due perhaps to accidental reprogramming, however, Phoenix is now even more vicious and brutal than before.

Cashing in on the success of Free Willy, Sly and Snipes release the Demolition Man.

Completely baffled about how to deal with Phoenix, the SAPD decides the only way to stop him is to fight fire with fire. Thus, they awaken Spartan and begin the manhunt.

The movie, of course, features lots of gratuitous violence and mass destruction. Although not too gory, there is one graphic scene involving a removed eyeball.

Demolition Man features a hilarious script. Most jokes involve the cute but anal dialect the San Angeleans use in the future.

The plot is an over-simplistic one of revenge and counter-revenge. A budding romance between Spartan and a pretty SAPD lieutenant (played by Sandra Bullock) is thrown in for good measure.

While the story is predictable and easy to follow, no reason is given at all for Phoenix being so evil, and one is left wondering how the feud and mutual hatred between Spartan and Phoenix began in the first place.

Though typical of the genre, one is still amazed at how both the protagonist and antagonist can fall out of speeding cars on their heads and take hundreds of rounds of machine-gun rounds, several dozen laser death-rays, dozens of pistol bullets and stabbings, too many punches and kicks to count, and still emerge with nary a flesh wound.

The action is fast-paced and thrilling. Combat scenes, both armed and hand-to-hand, move at a dizzying pace. Special effects, while not spectacular, are nevertheless impressive, and mostly involve the cryogenic freezing facility or high-tech laser ray guns.

Overall, this film was entertaining and enjoyable. If you're looking for another fast-paced, violent action film, or if you're a Stallone or Snipes fan, this is the film for you. If not, save your eight bucks.

The Way I Feel II: Loverboy cometh

by David Hodges
Cultural Archaeologist

The year was 1980, and I was all of eight years old.

It was the dawn of a new decade, which would serve to be the long hangover for the sins of a previous generation. I was young and free, unaware of the disaster which would be deemed the '80s a decade later. This did not matter though, because through it all they were there.

While I was bathing in a sea of ignorance, dressed to the height of fashion in my Empire Strikes Back T-shirt, red corduroy rigger pants, and a hand-me-down pair of North Star sneakers, they were there.

Late at night, long after my parents thought I was sound asleep, I would lie restless in my bed, strumming away feverishly at the tennis racket that served as my guitar. As those sweet melodies coarsed through the headset of my Sears' deluxe beginner's stereo set, I would close my eyes, entering a different reality as I lip-synched all those lyrics I knew so well.

Maybe I was just a young fool, caught up in a world of fantasy, living out my dreams through the accomplishments of others—but it didn't matter, because they were there. Yes, those pioneers of early '80s cheese glam-rock were there for me. Many great groups may come to mind: TROOPER, FOR-EIGNER, AIR SUPPLY, TRIUMPH, HAYWIRE, CHILLIWACK, TOTO, but I am of course speaking of... LOVERBOY.

LONG DAY IN THE UNIVERSE

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 21 TO THURSDAY, OCTOBER 28

Thursday, October 21

Like Water For Chocolate is playing tonight and tomorrow at 7:15 and 9:15 at the Mayfair. It's about sex and cooking. Yum!

Friday, October 22

Carleton's English department is presenting Native Canadian writer Jeanette Armstrong, who will be giving this year's annual Munro Beattie lecture at C264 Loeb Building. She's just written a paper titled "Writing Visibility: Life Writing and First Nations Identity," which sounds informative. It starts at 8:15 p.m. Refreshments will follow.

Sub Pop recording artists Eric's Trip touch down at Fenn Lounge in residence tonight at 8 p.m. Opening are Pig Out and Mushroom Explosion, who we hear are big fans of the Natural Law Party. Tickets are $7 at the usual independent outlets or $8 at the door. For more info, call 234-PUNX.

Loverboy, those heroes of cheese rock, play the Penguin tonight. It's now official: the nineties have become the eighties.

Saturday, October 23

It's the long-awaited return of Ottawa emocore demigods Uncommon Society, with extra special guests Kill the Ego, Fosseptic and Trailer Dickson, 8:30 p.m. at Café Alternatif at the University of Ottawa. Prepare yourself for a surprise announcement from Uncommon Society. What will it be? Are they turning into a John Denver tribute band? Will they be teaming up with Heaven Dog to salute the eighties? Go see the show to find out.

Spain's Milladoiro play the Museum of Civilization's Theatre tonight at 8 p.m. as part of that fun See and Hear the World series. They play Celtic music in a way that's truly exhilarating. Go see. Tickets are $16 in advance, $19 at the door.

The Mahones, from Kingston, are at Zaphod's tonight. Expect great Celtic-type music. Cover is six dollars.

Sunday, October 24

Comic Debris do wacky, wacky sketch and improv stuff every Tuesday night at the Glue Pot Pub. But tonight, for their adoring fans, they're presenting their show Les Miserable Phantom Cat (and His Amazing Technicolour Dreamcoat) at Creeque Alley. Hint: bring 200 grams of mild cheddar cheese and make the actors feel very special.

Monday, October 25

Election night. Government is captured by a tired party with a tired leader. Much is made of how the popular vote doesn't represent the number of seats captured.

Fire alarm system malfunctions

by Matt Skinner
Charlatan Staff

Carleton's fire alarm system has been partially inoperable since Oct. 16 and students living in residence were not notified of the problem until days after the malfunction occurred.

Bonnie O'Neil-Small, a floor rep on the fourth floor of Stormont House, says she was not aware there was a problem with the alarms until she was approached by a Charlatan reporter on Oct. 22.

She says students pay a lot of money to live in residence and should be made aware of situations such as these, just like tenants in any other apartment building.

"If (residents) weren't told of the situation, that's a serious problem," says Dave Scott of the Ottawa Fire Department's prevention division.

Kevin Gallinger, chief operating engineer of the central heating plant, says the problem with the alarms was discovered on Saturday, Oct. 16.

He says the malfunction affects all the buildings on campus and each building was informed about it on Monday, Oct. 18.

Mancel Cummings, superintendent of buildings and grounds services, says usually when a fire alarm is triggered on campus, either at a pull station or by a smoke detector, the alarm will sound but the fire department will not be automatically notified of the fire.

Cummings says a triggered fire alarm registers on a warning panel at the university heating plant and someone from the plant calls the fire department.

He says the problem is the central processing unit has broken down, but a new one is on rush order. Without it, the heating plant is not automatically told of a fire on campus, and therefore cannot call the fire department.

Gallinger says the new unit should have arrived Thursday, Oct. 21, but when approached by The Charlatan on Oct. 26, it had still not arrived.

"It's on its way," he says.

Gallinger says while the main alarm panel is not working, each building on campus still has an individual panel that indicates where an alarm has sounded in the building.

But Cummings says these panels are not under watch 24 hours a day like the warning panels in the heating plant.

Residence fellows were told of the problem in a memo issued on Oct. 21 by Beverley Cruikshank, assistant director of housing and food services.

The memo says in the event of a fire, members of residence are to telephone the residence service desk rather than the fire department. The service desk will then contact the heating plant, and the plant will call the fire department.

O'Neil-Small says when floor reps were trained prior to the first-year students' arrival, they were told that in the case of any emergency they are not to call 911, but rather should call the res fellow or campus security.

"It goes against anything we've ever been taught," she says.

Gallinger says there is nothing wrong with an individual calling 911 after evacuating a building, but says the heating plant should also be notified, so they can also contact the fire department.

Cruikshank says she was made aware of the malfunction immediately, but she did not pass on the information to res fellows until Oct. 21 because the residence security and maintenance crews were informed of the problem immediately.

"We've got people in the building almost 24 hours a day," she says.

A memo distributed throughout the Unicentre building on Oct. 18 by Lucy Watson, president of the Carleton University Students' Association, says the heating plant is experiencing serious problems with the fire alarm panel for all buildings of the university.

The temporary procedure outlined in the memo requires that in the event of a fire, each office is advised to call the university heating plant, not the fire department. If the plant's line is busy, the procedure is to call the university emergency number, so they may call the plant. The plant then telephones the fire department.

Gallinger says the heating plant is informed beforehand if a fire alarm is a drill and they can pass this information to the fire department.

"Anytime anyone is aware of a fire, regardless of the procedure, you can always call the fire department," Scott says.

Watson says she thinks the problem with the alarm system poses a minor risk to students in the Unicentre building. She says in her office the person at the front desk has been designated to call the heating plant in the event of a fire. □

Muslims seek prayer space

by Andrea Wiebe
Charlatan Staff

Muslim students at Carleton must find a new place to pray because their prayer room in the International Students' Centre is too small, says Ehab Shanti, the centre's co-ordinator.

"This room was given approximately seven or eight years ago and, at that time, the (number of) persons requiring a place to pray were small enough so that the room was adequate for their needs," says Umar Kabir, president of the Muslim Students' Association.

The prayer room was moved to the centre about eight years ago as a temporary measure, until another space could be found.

"The problem wasn't solved last year because there wasn't any space available," says Shanti.

Now, some Muslim students are working with the centre and Theresa Cowan, director of services at the Carleton University Students' Association, to make arrangements for a new prayer room.

"We are looking at different options and looking at finding a better place for the prayer room," says Cowan. "My responsibility is to make sure that the International Students' Centre is operating at its fullest capacity and to help the Muslim students find a room that's better than the International Students' Centre."

Kabir says about 50 people come into the prayer room each day.

"What has happened is that, over the past few years, growing numbers of international students have caused this room to become simply too small for their needs."

Practising Muslims pray five times each day. The students who use the prayer room do not all come in at the same time but, says Kabir, they "come in waves," so the room gets crowded quite often during the day. Canadian students who are Muslim often use the room to pray, as well as international students.

There have been other problems caused by the overcrowding, says Shanti. Since Muslims must wash before praying, they have to use the washrooms beside the centre which accommodate only one person at a time. The Mature and Part-Time Students' Centre shares the washrooms with the International Students' Centre and the line-up can get to be enormous.

"You can't ask a 90-year-old man to walk downstairs to use the washroom," says Shanti. Some men have even started using the women's washroom because they had to wait so long, he says.

The overcrowding is even worse during the winter.

"The room gets quite crowded," says Kabir, "because prayer-time is according to the position of the sun and, because

City inspects local homes to enforce bylaws

by Susie Haley
Charlatan Staff

Some student residences in Ottawa South were found to be in violation of the City of Ottawa's property standards bylaw during property inspections conducted between Oct. 1 and Oct. 15.

Out of about 1,900 homes in Ottawa South, 131 were found to be in violation of the bylaw. About 31 of these were thought to be student residences.

The City of Ottawa's property standards office has responded to specific housing complaints in previous years. However, this is the first year they have initiated inspections, says Jim Watson, city councillor for Capital Ward.

Watson says he has observed "a trend over the last several years of student properties falling into disrepair" in Ottawa South.

"It is not acceptable that landlords continue to extract large amounts of rent from student tenants, but in many cases allow their properties to deteriorate to the detriment of both the student and the neighbors," says Watson.

The area affected by these inspections is bordered by Bronson Avenue, Bank Street, the Rideau Canal, and the Rideau River.

Joe Cottitto, an inspector for the city, says the first step in the inspection process was a drive-by visual inspection. He inspected for various violations set out in the property standards bylaw.

For example, the bylaw states "a yard should be kept clean and free from rubbish, or other debris, refrigerators, freezers, or similar appliances, whether operable or inoperable and objects or conditions that may create a health or accident hazard."

The bylaw further states that "every dwelling shall be kept free from rubbish, debris or any condition which constitutes an accident hazard."

While the legal obligation to keep a property clean is the landlord's, students often contribute to property infractions by littering and being irresponsible, says Catherine Junop, manager of property standards and site plan inspections for the city.

Twenty-five student rental properties in violation were served with an informal notice that they were in violation of the bylaw, following a closer external inspection, says Watson. The owner of the property then had 48 hours to fix any problems before the city intervened.

The property owners who had not made repairs in that time received a formal notice, which legally binds to make the repairs.

Of the student properties in violation, two landlords received formal notices, says Watson. Owners will not be allowed to appeal, but extensions may be granted, says Junop.

Watson says student housing is "one area where we actually do have leverage to get things done."

According to Watson, the city may opt to repair the property and add the expense of the repair to the owner's tax bill, with an added administration fee. It is not certain whether this will happen with any properties that have received notices, because the landlords have "several weeks" to respond to the formal notices of violation, says Watson.

He also says because of the Landlord-Tenant Act, student tenants of problem properties cannot be punished.

Junop and Watson say they hope the inspections opened dialogue between the student residents, property owners, and the property standards office.

Watson says the inspections were "a Curriculum helps perpetuate racism

by Josée Bellemare
Charlatan Staff

Carleton's Euro-centric curriculum might help perpetuate racism, says the director of academics for the Carleton University Students' Association.

"The school system does a lot to perpetuate racism through the curriculum in all levels of education," says Gary Anandasangaree.

He gives the example of a second-year political science course about the history of political theory. The course is described in the university calendar as "a study of Western political thought from classical times to the nineteenth century."

Anandasangaree says this is too narrow a perspective. "The only thing that they're teaching is Western political thought. They're not even considering a thinker like (Mahatma) Gandhi."

Simon Brascoupé, Carleton's race relations advisor, says he agrees with Anandasangaree. He says students he has met with feel the European focus of Carleton's curriculum is inappropriate.

Brascoupé says he's trying to solve the curriculum problem through public and private consultations of a university needs assessment committee. He says public consultations regarding racism were conducted last March by nine committee members, both students and faculty.

The committee was formed last November to "address systemic racism at Carleton," Anandasangaree says.

During the consultations, speeches were given about international issues and a group of students asked questions concerning the curriculum, teaching methods, and the general environment at Carleton, says race equity co-ordinator Rashmi Luther.

Luther is a professor in Carleton's school of social work. She says private consultations are still provided for students who do not wish to ask questions in public.

Brascoupé says the purpose of the consultations is to make people more sensitive to issues like employment equity and sexual harassment. He says the committee provides support by helping people talk about their concerns.

"One of the things we've been told by students is that they need a mechanism for complaints," he says. "The university will have to develop a race relations equity policy."

Luther says part of the problem with the Euro-centric curriculum is the lack of teachers at Carleton who come from different ethnic backgrounds.

"I think related to that are the lack of sufficient numbers located in teaching," she says. "People are not given an opportunity to hear from a range of voices."

Luther says the committee is looking at ways to improve the situation at Carleton and hopes it will be ready to make recommendations to administration starting in January.

The committee will have an interim report ready "very soon," says Anandasangaree, and a final report by the end of March.

Brascoupé says he will try to open more doors for frustrated students. He says he will recommend that Carleton establish an educational program on racism next fall so people become more aware of racial issues.

He says it may be seminars and workshops depending on what staff and students need. He says training will be provided for people interested in building better approaches to racism and race relations. Anandasangaree says racism won't disappear easily.

"It's a long-standing problem and it's going to take a long time to resolve," he says. □

Activist shatters misconceptions about disability

by Alexis English
Charlatan Staff

Robin Smith's "Disabled and Proud" seminar was a light-hearted approach to relating to people with disabilities, whether you are disabled or not.

Smith is a disability rights activist from New York. Her seminar, held on Oct. 15, was aimed at destroying myths about disabilities. Between 25 and 30 people attended Smith's talk.

A poster on the wall at the seminar read, "A Disability is just another gr8 way to B Alive." To help people focus on positive attitudes about their bodies and themselves, Smith had them repeat statements like, "I love making mistakes."

Smith asked the group to recognize that differences exist in nature and among people that aren't automatically good or bad.

"There is no such thing as imperfections in nature," she said. "How wonderful it would be if we could all appreciate each other free of constraints of perceptions about what is perfect. We could all just be."

She emphasized that our perceptions about other people are all culturally and socially formed. Smith called these perceptions "recordings" that we are "hypnotized" with as children.

Group members offered words associated with misconceptions about the disabled: "damaged, helpless, wheelchair-bound, chains, victim, needy, dependent."

One person with a disability offered the word "deformed," while others said, "slow, incompetent."

A volunteer sat in a wheelchair and draped herself in a sheet of paper with the negative words about disabilities. Smith pretended to hit the woman over the head with a cardboard stick to demonstrate the oppression of these negative perceptions and how the disabled and non-disabled internalize this oppression. She said we do the most damage by pulling ourselves back and putting up barriers.

Smith said attitudes about disabilities prevent us from getting close to one another and to ourselves.

"Little children don't care—they will play with one another even if one kid can walk and one can't. But parents tell their children not to bother people who are in wheelchairs," she said.

Jane Keeler, human rights educator on campus for Carleton's status of women office, was at the seminar.

"Sometimes when I see a person in a wheelchair, I close down and I just don't think about them because they're different. I go unconscious. And I don't realize how they may have a whole variety of life that can be as rich and different as anybody else's," she said.

Keeler said we have to feel comfortable about ourselves before we can overcome labels in our minds and become closer to others who may act and look different.

At any moment, we may all have to deal with a disability. A woman at the Robin Smith doesn't let anybody box her in.

seminar who uses a wheelchair described her situation to the group as "a challenge to adapt, and constantly figure out how to get from point A to point B, how to park on hills."

She also said she doesn't like people's reaction to her and having to always explain things to people. She said she doesn't like people thinking she can't do anything—like speak, think, or use her hands.

"In case you didn't all know, this is a very intelligent woman," said Smith, which prompted laughter from the group and from the woman as well. Smith encourages others to think, listen and talk with each other because, "we are all interconnected human beings." □

Why is the parking garage so ugly?

When I look out my classroom window at the visitor's parking garage near the administration building, my mind begins to drift and the faint sounds of gunfire, mortar explosions, and the Rolling Stones' "Paint it Black" fill my head.

This has gone on for some time and I thought the stress of post-secondary education was pushing me over the edge. I began to believe I was going crazy, delirious, and whompin' mad!

I'm not crazy. Nor do I take pleasure in listening to the horrific sounds of war.

It's because Carleton's parking garage looks like the bombed out Sarajevo Hilton!

Why would anyone in their right mind design a structure that foreign journalists would love to photograph if Canada was being blitzed by the Luftwaffe?

Aren't post-secondary institutions, including parking garages, places of beauty and serenity? Aren't they supposed to be full of trees, squirrels and other assorted critters?

Not at Carleton. Here we believe in grey, boring concrete slabs.

"It's poorly placed," says Ben Gianni, director of Carleton's school of architecture. "It's a shame that one of the nicest places on campus, the lawn by the administration building, has to be taken up with that structure."

A parking garage shouldn't be more than four stories but here we have 10, says Gianni.

"That's what happens on most university campuses. More students with cars want a place to park and this is the result," he says.

Here's the history of Carleton's dark and morbid structure.

The visitor's parking garage was built in 1969, according to Bill Radway, project co-ordinator for physical plant. The architect's firm was Murray and Murray and the contractor is unknown.

It has received many renovations and repairs since then, says Radway. "From 1989 to 1993 there has been structural repairs to the spinal ramp and perimeter in 1989. In 1990, stairwell renovations were done on all 10 floors. And waterproof applications have been done on all floors between 1990 and 1993."

It holds about 750 cars and maybe a few pockets of soldiers that think the war isn't over yet. What a pity that the visitor's parking garage ruined it for buildings like the Mackenzie Building and Paterson Hall.

Now, every time I look at the grey walls and hollow insides that make up the garage, I will continue to feel as if I am at the front. But that's okay, because now I have an even bigger problem — I am obsessed with counting the bricks in Dunton Tower. □

Duh, it's a divider, dimwits

by Ian McLeod
Charlatan Staff

It's a page divider.

For the past four weeks, glossy, green, advertising-laden slabs of cardboard have been flapping about the campus.

Available at Rooster's, the Unicentre Store, and the Carleton University Students' Association headquarters, students are snapping them up, with but a single question — "What the hell are they?"

Well, according to CUSA publications officer Stacy Fietz, it's a bookmark.

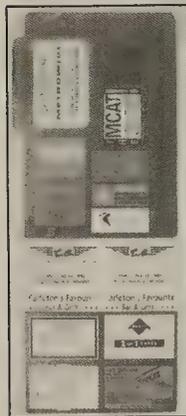

No, make that "a page divider, 'cause it's bigger and better than a bookmark."

Originally intended to accompany this year's student handbook which was distributed free at the beginning of September, Fietz says "the printer took three times as long as anticipated," hence its delayed debut.

Renée Gallant, the ad and sales representative for the handbook, adds that the divider cost CUSA nothing.

Indeed, CUSA President Lucy Watson says the production cost of $5,704.29 is covered by the ad revenues it generated.

However, there is one problem for those who want to use the divider for the purpose for which it is intended — it has a tendency to slip off the page. □

VOYAGEUR RE-INVENTS THE WHEEL!

Without going on to describe to TRAWG in macro-economic terms the benefits of his new bus wheel, nor stopping to explain its harmonic relationship to environmental purity and general green-ness, GROG simply noted that, ceteris paribus, Voyageur's $59 student return fare is the cheapest way to travel between Ottawa and Toronto.

Unfortunately in the general evolutionary scheme of things this offer is relatively short term, i.e. it ends December 15th, 1993. He also said that he feels students should support him in his efforts to keep his wheels rolling.

Fun Farquhar Fact ... ever ything you wanted to know about Sparky but were too apathetic to ask communal bowl of Life cereal, when the mail was dropped off on a Monday morning. It contained the usual stuff: numerous fan letters, bills, a complementary packet of strawberry-flavored Jell-O brand gelatin.

Amidst all that, there was also a letter from Maclean's.

A subscription offer perhaps.

Maybe a bill. We're not sure, because our mothers always told us never to open other people's mail.

Plus we weren't able to steam it open.

All in all, it was just a regular letter. Except for one thing: it was addressed to (and we're not making this up)

What could this

Why the pseudonym? And why the mailing address so close to ours (Room 531 Unicentre)?

We have a few theories:

- 1) Sparky needs a new clock radio.
- 2) He's a closet Maclean's fan. He enjoys the insightful commentaries and the tasteful, not-at-all sexist or exploitive "People" page. As for the address, Sparky fantasizes about working for The Charlatan and in a fit of imaginative bliss gave Maclean's the wrong address.
- 3) Someone in the Maclean's mailroom has a keen, if pedestrian, sense of humor. If so, this person should be promoted immediately to inject some life into what is a humorless and dull magazine. Editor-in-chief would not be too modest a promotion.

4) Someone at Maclean's (or some other sick individual) thought they'd have a cheap laugh at Farquhar's expense by mailing said envelope to Carleton's newspaper.

If so, we cry, "Shame!" We at The Charlatan say rally 'round our fearless leader in his time of need. If he wants to read a magazine, let's all chip in to buy him a subscription to a real magazine, a quality magazine. Like, say, Highlights For Children.

Postscript: after Mr. Haggart wrote this report and we forwarded the unopened envelope to Sparky, a copy of Maclean's magazine arrived at The Charlatan office. Don't ask us. We just work here.

The Ottawa South area was chosen as the first to be tested partly due to the large number of complaints, says Junop.

If successful, Junop says the inspections could spread to other parts of the city, including areas where large numbers of students from the University of Ottawa live.

While the city is aware that many students live outside of Ottawa South, Junop says limited funds restrict what areas the city can look at.

the days are shorter, the times are closer together."

Kabir is hoping to find a central location on campus for the prayer room. "Last year, they found a place in the gym; however, due to the inaccessibility of that location, it was impractical for students to use," Kabir says.

Since some Muslims pray five times each day, it is inconvenient for them to walk all the way to the gym. Shanti says there has been some discussion about moving the prayer room to Room 225 in Residence Commons.

Cowan, the Muslim Students' Association and the International Students' Centre will meet again soon to decide whether having the prayer room in residence is a practical solution, says Shanti.

"It's a problem for the International Students' Centre and a problem for the Muslim students themselves," says Kabir. "The issue should be resolved as quickly as possible and hopefully it will be in the near future."

NATIONAL AFFAIRS

Carleton cool on Chrétien's majority

by Jill Mahoney
Charlatan Staff

Out with the old and in with the new? Well, sort of.

The Liberal party won a large majority, taking 177 seats in the Oct. 25 federal election, more than 60 per cent of the possible 295 seats.

The Progressive Conservative government suffered a massive defeat, falling to only two seats in the House of Commons.

Ottawa Centre, the riding that includes Carleton, re-elected the same Member of Parliament as in 1988. But instead of sitting on the opposition side of the House, Mac Harb is now part of the majority Liberal government.

Harb won the riding by a landslide over his closest rival, Marion Dewar of the NDP, with 19,576 votes to Dewar's 8,530. Carleton business professor and PC candidate Ian Lee finished third with 4,367 votes and the Reform candidate, Len Tucker, came fourth with 3,559 votes. All vote totals are still unofficial tallies, according to Elections Canada.

Around Carleton, reaction to both Harb's victory and the Liberal majority was mixed.

"I have serious concerns with the fact the Liberals took such a majority. It will have a profound effect on students and post-secondary education," said Lucy Watson, president of the Carleton University Students' Association.

Watson says the Liberals didn't clearly define a specific plan for students in the election campaign and the party's unwillingness to reinstate student grants will adversely affect students.

Watson says she hopes having a government member representing Ottawa Centre will benefit students, but has reservations about Harb's commitment to Carleton students.

"I don't think Mac Harb has played a big role here. He has been invisible on campus. Marion Dewar was very active on the board of governors and supported the initiative to only increase tuition by three per cent last year."

Lucy Sharratt, co-chair of the Carleton New Democratic Youth club, says she hasn't felt Harb's presence on campus, either.

"I can't believe Mac Harb's back in office. I think Marion Dewar would have been such a brilliant person in Parliament," she says. "I think it's disastrous for students that Marion Dewar wasn't elected. I haven't seen Mac Harb on campus. I don't know what he stands for."

Max Fishman, president of the Carleton Reform Party club, says he doesn't think the Liberal majority will make any significant change in students' conditions.

"If students hoped for a dramatic change, like in the reduction of tuition, it won't happen."

He says the Liberal plan of short-term job creation will probably increase the deficit, but the large number of Reform members elected to Parliament will work to keep the Liberals in line. The Reformers won 52 seats to finish third behind the Bloc Québécois.

Chrétien: new PM gets mixed reviews at Carleton.

"The Liberals have a history of wasting money. Now with the large Reform representation, the Liberals will have to be more responsible."

But he says there will be short-term changes in Ottawa Centre with a Liberal government member that will affect students.

"I have a certain feeling there will be an abundance of government contracts. The Liberals have always been good to Ottawa."

He says this could be in the form of civic work projects or cultural programs the Liberals might develop in order to create employment. He also says the Liberals' job apprenticeship program will probably be tested here.

Dave Gourlay, president of the Carleton's Young Liberals, said the election result was "just phenomenal."

Despite Harb's convincing re-election, Gourlay says he doesn't believe Harb is in line for a cabinet position. But he said Harb could end up as parliamentary secretary dealing with literacy and education issues.

The Liberals won in all four Carleton residence polls, although the official margin is not yet available from Elections Canada. Gourlay says this positive reaction from students represents "a significant change." In 1988, all four residence polls were won by the PC candidate, despite Harb's victory in the riding.

"This election will be one that political science students in the future will want to study and analyze," says Gourlay.

Jill Vickers, professor of political science and Canadian studies, says the election result represents the break-up of the traditional right-wing coalition between the East and West, formerly held together by "Mr. Mulroney's bag of patronage."

Vickers also said she was happy the Liberals received a strong mandate.

"I'm very pleased we have a majority government."

Carl Gillis, chair of the Canadian Federation of Students, said he hopes the Liberals will approach student issues in a different way than the Conservatives and consult more with students.

Gillis says the CFS will be pushing the Liberals to reform the Canada Student Loan program and to increase transfer payments to the provinces for education.

He says he is feeling "cautiously optimistic" with the thought of a new government, but it is too early now to know if there will be substantial positive changes for students. □

International students face cuts to health care

by Ryan Nakashima
Charlatan Staff

Some university students in Ontario are petitioning to stop the provincial NDP government's plan to stop paying for foreign students' health care coverage.

The plan to cut Ontario Health Insurance Plan (OHIP) coverage to Ontario's temporary residents was announced along with the social contract in April as part of the province's overall plan to reduce its deficit. Other items of the overall package have been implemented, but the government has only recently begun to work out the details of the planned health cuts.

If implemented, the cuts would save the government about $50 million per year by cutting OHIP to Ontario's 167,000 temporary residents, says Paul Kilbertus, a spokesperson for the Ontario Ministry of Health.

About 20,000 of those are international students, says Kilbertus. Refugee claimants, people who are applying for landed immigrant status and temporary workers will also be affected.

The government is still reviewing the plan, but it is mainly working just to "firm up numbers," not to redefine the groups that will be affected, says Kilbertus.

"This is the plan. So it's not for me to say if political pressures are going to change their plans," says Kilbertus. He also says the plan will likely take effect in the next two years.

Emechete Onuoha, chair of the Canadian Federation of Students-Ontario, says while the decision can be made by the Ontario cabinet, the proposal has not yet been discussed in the NDP caucus.

Onuoha is organizing a petition and letter-writing campaign among over 26 Ontario universities through their student associations to stop the plan. He says student groups were not consulted by the government about the plan.

"You would think a responsible government would try to get some input from those who will be affected," says Onuoha. "Hopefully we'll be able to avoid the prescribed decision from being taken."

Ehab Shanti, co-ordinator of the International Students' Centre at Carleton, is circulating the petition at Carleton, along with Dave Hubka, vice-president external of the Graduate Students' Association.

Hubka says over 500 people have already signed. Although other universities have already been sending their petitions and letters to the government, Hubka says Carleton's will be sent in about a month when more signatures have been collected.

Shanti says the planned cuts are unfair to international students who already pay about four times as much as other students. They pay higher tuition (between about $7,000 and $11,000 per year) and, on top of living expenses, they have to pay for visa renewals and work permits.

"This is adding to the message that to be an international student in Ontario, you have to be very, very well off," says Shanti.

Kilbertus estimates OHIP coverage is worth about $1,700 per person per year in private insurance, a number the ministry got by taking their annual OHIP budget of $17 billion and dividing it by Ontario's population of about 10 million. The cost of universal health care is currently paid for by deductions from businesses at no cost to individuals.

But Onuoha says the CFS's student health network estimates private coverage would cost anywhere from $300 per year if an Ontario-wide group plan among international students is organized, to $1,000 per year for individual coverage.

No matter the cost, says Onuoha, the planned cuts represent a "systemic financial attack on international students."

Shanti says while some students are covered under plans originating in their home countries or by the Canadian International Development Agency, many do not have any coverage other than OHIP.

Some students say they may opt to go without coverage if the NDP plan takes effect, deterred by the high cost of private coverage.

Gary Lo, a second-year Carleton economics student from Hong Kong, says he will probably not pay for coverage if OHIP is taken away.

"I won't buy it. I don't have enough money," says Lo. He says he already spends about $15,000 per year going to school.

He says if he loses his coverage he will be "very scared if I get into an accident." □

BOG subject to new affirmative action policy

by Michael Mainville
Charlatan Staff

New initiatives proposed by Ontario's NDP government to make university governing bodies more representative of minority groups have raised concerns about the makeup of Carleton's board of governors.

On Oct. 7, Dave Cooke, Ontario minister of education and training, announced new initiatives to help broaden university and college board representation by including more visible minorities and women.

"Ontario's society is changing and it's important that our institutions and their governing structures reflect that change," said Cooke in a press release. "The initiatives we're proposing will make governing bodies more representative."

To this end, the provincial government has come up with new guidelines for the appointment of universities' board members.

University or college boards are the schools' senior governing bodies and are usually comprised of student, faculty, staff, administration and community representatives. Boards ratify budgets and vote on policy decisions which affect the schools.

The new guidelines are based primarily on three principles, the first being "that membership should reflect the variety of perspectives, backgrounds, experiences and skills required for the effective functioning of the body."

The second guideline states "universities governing bodies should be suitably representative of internal communities," which includes student, faculty, and staff groups.

Finally, university governing bodies should "ensure equitable representation of groups traditionally under-represented on boards, such as women, people with disabilities, Aboriginal peoples, francophones, and racial and ethno-cultural minorities."

Carleton's own board is not a reflection of visible minorities in the community, says Jim Watson, city councillor for the Capital Ward and a member of Carleton's board of governors. He says he is in favor of the government directives.

"It makes sense for the board to be given direction to better serve the university's best interests," says Watson.

Watson says his personal preference would be to have more students on the board because "the board does not truly reflect the student population."

The board's members are all elected, except for the permanent positions held by the president and chancellor of the university.

Currently, the university community is represented by three faculty members, three students and two staff members. The rest of the board's 33 members are chosen from the community outside Carleton and consist mostly of professionals and senior executives.

Presently, there are 11 women on the board, or 33 per cent.

That's not an accurate representation of the university community, says Renée Twaddle, co-ordinator of Carleton's Women's Centre.

"Thirty-three per cent is not representative. I don't think that the university consists of straight white men," says Twaddle.

Twaddle says the board should take steps to make the board more accessible to women and minority groups, so it can be "inclusive of all perspectives."

"I think that maximum affirmative action is something all universities should follow," says Twaddle.

Ehab Shanti, co-ordinator for the International Students' Centre, is also in favor of the incentives to improve accessibility to the board.

"The board should go by how many international students are in the Carleton community. If there is 10 per cent international students, then there should be 10 per cent on the board of governors," says Shanti.

The number of people from visible minorities on the board is already close to 10 per cent, says Charles Watt, the board's secretary.

Watt says the board has had since Oct. 7 to consider the new initiatives and are taking steps to follow the guidelines.

"At their next meeting, the university relations committee of the board will be considering to what extent we will conform to the guidelines," says Watt.

All universities and colleges must submit their proposal to adhere to the guidelines by March 1994. □

Ghiz walks around the Bloc at Carleton

by Derek DeCloe
Charlatan Staff

Quebec's support for the Bloc Québécois doesn't mean Quebecers will choose to separate from Canada, the former premier of Prince Edward Island told a Carleton audience on Oct. 20.

"A lot of the people who are supporting the Bloc do not necessarily support sovereignty," said Joe Ghiz. "They are supporting the Bloc for protest reasons."

But, he added, it may mean Canadians will soon be discussing the constitution again.

The Bloc gained about half the popular vote in Quebec and 54 seats in the election Oct. 25.

Ghiz's lecture gave a crowd of about 70 people an inside look at what happened during the constitutional negotiations at Meech Lake and Charlottetown.

Ghiz, now the dean of law at Dalhousie University in Halifax, was the Liberal premier of P.E.I. from 1986 to January 1993 and a strong supporter of both agreements.

The agreements, both of which failed, were attempts by the premiers of the other nine provinces to gain Quebec's consent to the Constitution.

Politicians realized Canadians were "fed up" with the constitution and didn't want to discuss it during this election campaign, said Ghiz.

But he predicted forces such as the Bloc and the aboriginal community will make sure the issues discussed in the Charlottetown Accord will be discussed again.

"The issues have not disappeared from the Canadian agenda. They are at the back of the stove," said Ghiz. "And sooner or later they are going to emerge."

"How long do you think the aboriginal peoples of Canada are going to take a back seat?"

Clayoquot stump at CU

by Brandie Weikle
Charlatan Staff

A 4,000-kilogram stump was parked outside Dunton Tower on Oct. 26.

The stump has been on tour since Sept. 23 to raise awareness about logging in its former home in Clayoquot Sound, British Columbia.

Clayoquot Sound is among the largest remaining temperate rainforests on earth and is the largest rainforest intact on Vancouver Island. The area includes 260,000 hectares of densely forested inlets, valleys and islands on the west coast of the island.

On April 13, the NDP government in B.C. announced it would allow logging in a large portion of Clayoquot's old-growth forest. MacMillan Bloedel and Interfor are the only companies which hold licences to log the area.

The B.C. government owns four per cent of MacMillan Bloedel's shares. A pamphlet published by Greenpeace said "this makes them the largest single shareholder in the corporation they are responsible for regulating."

The stump's tour is part of the Western Canadian Wilderness Committee's campaign to draw national attention to Clayoquot. The stump is making its way across Canada on a flatbed trailer.

Bernard Schulmann, who left his job in the computer industry in B.C. to campaign for the committee, is one of the coordinators of the "Coast to Coast for Clayoquot" tour, which hit Parliament Hill Oct. 22.

Schulmann said the tour arrived in Ottawa before the election so the participants could draw attention to Clayoquot as a national issue. He said the stump tour has been received very well.

tive comment behind," said Schulmann.

While at Carleton, the committee presented a slide show and information seminar about Clayoquot on Oct. 27. The day before, tour participants sold buttons, calendars, postcards and memberships to the Western Canadian Wilderness Committee outside Dunton Tower. They also gave away complimentary chunks of wood cut in Clayoquot to donors.

The funds they collect are used to finance the tour and any money left over will go to the Nuu-Chah-nulth Tribal Council, a Native group on Vancouver Island, says Schulmann. Part of Clayoquot Sound is a Native land reserve and much of the rest is claimed by Native groups.

"They have very active land claims in the area and want to enter negotiation with the provincial government and the federal government," said Schulmann.

Eighteen people from the Ottawa Coalition to Save Clayoquot Sound were arrested Oct. 19 after a sit-in protest at Progressive Conservative party headquarters.

Among those arrested was "Clayoquot" Keith Ashdown, who ran for Member of Parliament in Ottawa Centre in this week's election to raise awareness about the issue. All those arrested were subsequently released.

The Clayoquot area itself has seen widespread civil disobedience, with almost 800 people arrested since the decision, says Valerie Langer, director of the

Friends of the Clayoquot Sound, a B.C. environmental lobby group. Blockades of logging roads have been set up by environmentalists to disrupt the logging operations.

One woman who was arrested on July 27 has been sending dispatches describing her trial for contempt of court through FreeNet, a national public computer information network.

In an Oct. 25 dispatch describing the first week of her trial, Gwethalyn Gauvreau wrote "there have been almost 800 of us arrested and charged with criminal contempt of court for the same crime of blocking a logging road in a remote part of Vancouver Island."

Gauvreau said the people on trial before her received sentences of 45 to 60 days in jail and $1,000 to $3,000 fines for delaying trucks for 15 to 20 minutes.

Another national awareness effort is the Clayoquot Express, a train starting in Halifax that is travelling "From the Ocean without Fish to the Forest without Trees," according to its slogan. It will be passing through Ottawa Nov. 2.

Toki Geurer, a Sierra Club member in Ottawa, said she will be among about 50 people on the train by the time it leaves Ottawa and expects 150 to 200 people to be on it by the time it arrives in B.C.

"We are asking for a moratorium on all road building and logging in Clayoquot Sound," said Geurer.

The first stop after Ottawa is Toronto, where Blue Rodeo and other artists will give a benefit concert for Clayoquot Nov. 3.

Spanish Celtic: Out of this World

by Alex Bustos
Charlatan Staff

Outstanding! Amazing! Out of this world!

Milladoiro, a Celtic band from Spain, completely blew away the 400 people that gathered to listen to this musical gem at the Museum of Civilization. The concert was part of the museum's See and Hear the World series.

The group comes from Galicia, a region located in northwest Spain. It has served as an important religious centre since the Middle Ages, as Catholic pilgrims from every country in Europe have been travelling here since the 10th century.

"Galicia is within the area of influence of Celtic countries that existed before the Romanization of European countries and the extension of the Roman Empire," says Rodrigo Romani, harpist and group leader.

He says the region has also been influenced by the Persian civilization, the Latin civilization, and the Germanic People.

"All of them created a conglomerate of a strange mixture of cultures that reflect in the traditional music today," he says.

Unlike the south of Spain, Galicia was not greatly affected by the Moors, who Milladoiro wowed the crowd with their special blend of Spanish Celtic.

conquered Spain in the 8th century.

The group's name comes from the small piles of stones left by pilgrims en route to signify that their journey had an historic as well as religious significance.

Romani says there is no special message in Milladoiro's music.

"Traditional music transmits a part of the soul of a nation and says something about its history. The influences that traditional music receives are historical influences from the various peoples that constitute the traditional soul of a nation," Romani says.

"However, there is a generic message that today you can live tradition in a more modern way. In other words, it's like cooking recipes with modern spices, and it's a music capable of reaching the people and entertain and amuse a public during two hours in a theatre."

And did it ever reach the crowd! The crowd gave the group three standing ovations.

The music, a Celtic sound which mixed jazz, popular music, and medieval tones, combined to produce an utterly awe-some display of musicianship.

When the concert ended, I asked Romani if he was planning to come back. He responded, "We hope to be back every year."

It is safe to say that everybody in the crowd felt the same way. One of the recurrent questions asked by the audience during the intermission and at the conclusion of the concert was, "Where can I get a cassette?"

The Museum of Civilization has a sharp eye for picking brilliance.

However, this time, they found genius. Milladoiro is a group that, like a spectacular author, deserves to be in the library of every person who appreciates music.

They opened the eyes of the crowd to a precious part of Spain. The group is, without a doubt, out of this world. □

Commentary: Language of a New Fusion

by Vishnu Som
Charlatan Staff

With a fusion of sounds that range from Jamaican reggae to rap to Indian bhangra, Apache Indian, a Manchester-based singer of Indian origin, has heralded a revolution among Indian youth both abroad and at home.

As an entire gamut of singers of Indian origin are becoming more popular, an increasing number of Indian youngsters are turning to western forms of music to express their discontent with elements of Indian culture and society which they find constraining and restrictive.

Indian's bhangramuffin is immensely popular today in large Indian cities as well as in London, Manchester, Toronto and Vancouver, where there are a large number of youngsters of Indian origin.

Bhangramuffin is a style of music; a frenzied fusion of lively Indian folk known as bhangra, with western types such as hip-hop, dance-hall, reggae and rap. The impact of this truly international sound upon urban Indian teenagers the world over has been tremendous.

To the casual observer, the language of bhangramuffin and rap seems silly and meaningless, as when Indian proclaims himself "hotter than the Bhindaloo curry!" and yet an in-depth look reveals that there is a point behind this ostensible silliness.

The language of rap is a language that mirrors the contradictions of cultural identity that young people feel. Indo-Canadians, for example, have been dubbed coconuts—brown on the outside with reference to their original identity and yet white on the inside with regard to their acceptance of the values and norms of the western society that they have been born into.

In a society that missed the sexual revolution which hit the west through the likes of Marilyn Monroe, issues such as dating have been long considered taboo. "All of us have girlfriends and boyfriends, but we can't talk about this to our parents," explained Indian in an interview with India's Sunday magazine.

"We can't talk about safe sex either."

He has, however, addressed such issues through songs such as "Arranged Marriage," where he has touched upon a topic that highlights the difference in attitudes of the older and younger generations of Indians. The last line of the song says it all—"About me arranged marriage, me have a problem. When is the right time to tell me girlfriend?"

Today, rap is fast becoming a channel through which urban youngsters in India can actually rebel by addressing topics that have for long been considered taboo. Raja, for example, has created a stir in India through his lyrics that describe the attributes of his voluptuous dream woman more graphically than most conservative-minded elders would care to hear.

As the older generation looks on in despair, Tips, a company in the music business has launched the album Shree Ramayan Mahatmya, a rapped up and satirical translation of the Ramayana, an ancient Indian epic with profound religious connotations.

With Indian as their idol and the increasing popularity of MTV in South Asia, numerous singers and groups have come up in India, adding a distinctly ethnic blend to rock, pop, reggae, rap and hip-hop.

Hindi rap is a sensation today in India. Rappers such as Raja and Baba Sehgal, whose album Thanda thanda pani had sold over 1 million copies in five months, are part of an immensely popular industry whose slogan is fast becoming "need no talent, will pay."

Outside India, bhangramuffin has become symbolic of a new fusion, a fusion in the interests of different ethnic minorities, whether West Indian, African, or Asian, who are trying to contend with the culture of the majority. It is a language of solidarity through which these disparate minority groups are trying to search for an identity.

Speaking to the Illustrated Weekly of India, Indian says—"What I am writing and singing about makes as much sense to the whites, who have grown up in a multi-racial society, as it does to the Jamaicans who have grown up with reggae.

"When black people understand white people and white people understand black people, a lot of problems can be solved" he adds.

For millions of Asian youth in the west, singers such as Indian are a symbol of their generation, a role model and their own Asian hero in the western world.

For youngsters in the big cities of India, the explosion of western music has resulted in an explosion in expression. So while the older generation watches in bewilderment and dismay, young Indians sway comfortably to the beat of a Baba Sehgal. □

Damn! No yogic flyer MPs

Whatever you might think of the results of this election, there's no denying that Canada has never seen anything quite like it before.

In past elections, we've seen births of parties and huge majority governments, but never have we seen a founding party of Canada go down in flames and a separatist party become Her Majesty's Official Opposition with a scary ultra-right party nipping at their heels.

Not that these are all necessarily bad things. Let's start with the Tories.

Glory be! The Tories are no more (for the time being) and does anyone really care? In her concession speech Kim Campbell boasted the Conservatives got as much of the national popular vote (about 16 per cent) as the Bloc Québécois, a party that ran candidates in only one province. While Kim appeared composed, it came across as a desperate bit of spin-doctoring.

While we're all dancing on the Tory grave, let's also make a toast to Canadian democracy. The death of the Tory party shows that your average voter can actually accomplish something.

And don't believe anyone who tries to play down the severity of their defeat. Right now they have about as much legitimacy as the Natural Law Party (and only two more seats).

They deserved what they got. Campbell and her Progressive Conservatives have finally paid for nine years of arrogance, ignoring the wishes of Canadians with their unpopular policies. The GST, the sheer hell of constitutional negotiations and Brian Mulroney have not, and will never be, forgotten or forgiven.

There's a valuable lesson for all the other parties to learn from the Tory annihilation: ignore Canadians' wishes at your peril.

But in the process of turfing the Tories, Canadians' protest votes went to the Bloc and the Reform party — a party to the right of the Conservatives.

It's understandable in tough times that people would vote for Reform, a party which promises a return to traditional values and democratic reform. But as a protest, voting for Reform makes absolutely no sense. Reform believes in things the Conservatives only wish they could implement, like the dismantling of Canada's social safety net.

There's some hope though — the nature of power in Ottawa is such that any party that desires to form the government must move their policies toward the centre. They also may keep their promise to bring in democratic reform, but don't hold your breath.

A better protest vote would have been for the NDP. Canada is home to views that span the entire ideological spectrum and whatever's left of the left needs a voice in Parliament. But there's no reason to feel sorry for the NDP — they're just paying for several years of invisibility on the federal level and some blatant promise-breaking by certain provincial governments.

As for the Bloc Québécois — official opposition? Huh? While it's true they do oppose Canada, this is probably not what the founders of the parliamentary system had in mind for the role of the official opposition.

The Bloc has only one goal: the destruction of the country and whatever they do in the House should be viewed in this context.

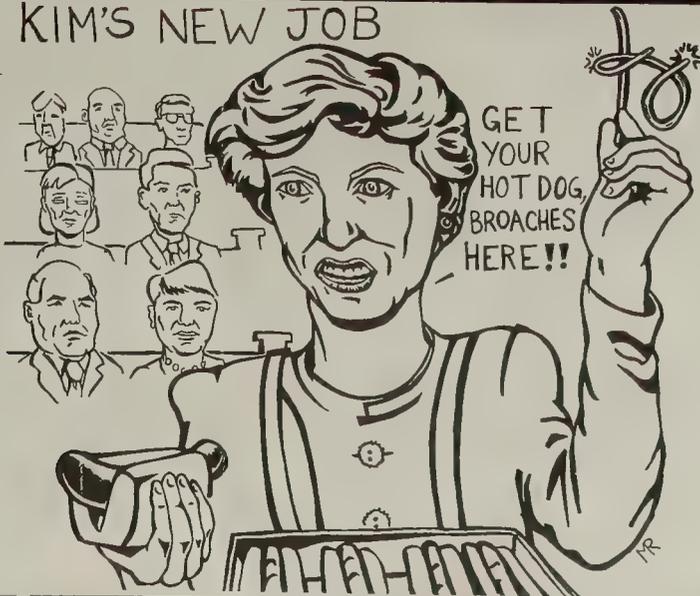

It's up to the Liberals to check the Bloc at every turn and get the strong federalist message out.

Just remember, the Liberals set the stage for our current fiscal crisis with the chronic deficits of the seventies. It won't be a total shock if they break all their promises, but if they actually do some good, (hey, you never know), it will be a pleasant surprise.

Just a quick bit of advice to Mac Harb, our Liberal MP for Ottawa Centre: How 'bout showing up on campus every now and then and telling us what you've been up to instead of waiting until the next election and just expecting our vote?

It was a historic election and it promises to be an eventful five years. The only thing that could have made this Parliament more interesting would have been a Natural Law MP yogic flying to work everyday. BH

KIM'S NEW JOB

OPINION

Why can't men be victims?

by David

David is a Carleton student who was abused by his wife for seven years. He divorced her this year. The author was willing to use his last name. However, it has been withheld to avoid identifying his ex-wife.

Relationship violence is becoming less and less a taboo topic these days. It's in the news and people are finally talking about it — including me.

Before I met my wife eight years ago, I had known women who were battered by men, and I had heard people say that "men are violent and women are victims." No one told me that it could be the other way around.

Men can be victims of relationship abuse. My wife was both verbally and physically violent towards me. I was beaten up every day, sexually assaulted regularly, and starved to the point where I was skin and bones by a woman who was a psychopath, sadist and pervert.

People noticed there was something wrong, but no one said anything. I guess they didn't know what to do.

Sometimes, as a form of gang rape, my wife's friends would hold me down while my wife sexually assaulted me. She enjoyed humiliating me before my friends and relatives by grabbing me between my legs or exposing my body in front of them.

I wanted to preserve the marriage, so I never hit back. Self-defence was limited to dodging her blows or running out of the room. I never even raised my voice. I tried to stop her anger by conforming to all of her demands. I believed that if I tried hard enough to be the perfect man then she would stop beating me, but she was still violent.

Several times, I said that I might phone the police and charge her with spouse abuse, but she just laughed and said no one would believe me. I also thought this, so I never phoned the police.

I know what it is like to be with a woman who is so possessive and emotionally dependent on me that she needed to control my thoughts, feelings and behavior through violence. She isolated me from my friends and family, so I had no support network.

She either trivialized the violence or blamed me for her abusive behavior. She repeatedly told me "you like it when I hit you" even though I was worried she would kill me. But, the worst thing was the verbal abuse, because my injuries have healed, but her words have stayed with me.

Finally, I realized there was nothing I could do to save the marriage, so I divorced her on the grounds of cruelty.

I'm not the only abused man. This happens to other men, too.

Even though there is growing acknowledgement among social scientists that equal percentages of women, men, and lesbians are beaten up by their intimates, violence against men is still a taboo topic.

Way back in 1978, Murray Straus, in his article "Wife Beating: How Common and Why?" published in Victimology: An International Journal, found "the data on severe violence, suggests that the wives were more violent" than husbands. Although Straus questions whether battered husbands are injured more seriously than battered wives, the inescapable conclusion is that wives are at least as violent as husbands.

Ever since then the literature on battered husbands has grown in leaps and bounds.

Douglas Mould, in his 1990 article "Data Base or Data Bias?" in American Psychologist, noted that since violent women often beat up non-violent husbands, you can't assume that when a woman beats up a man, she is acting in self-defence.

L.R. McNeely and Coramae Mann, in their 1990 article "Domestic Violence Is a Human Issue" in the Journal of Interpersonal Violence, explain women are capable of injuring men, especially since 82 per cent of male victimizations involve weapons used by females.

When I talk with people about abused men they almost always agree battered husbands exist. But, sometimes they believe abused men should not get public attention. They fear open discussion about violent women will distract attention from violence against women.

But why? Working to eradicate all violence does not trivialize the horrible tragedy of violence against women. Besides, isn't the real issue whether or not violence is acceptable behavior? Cruelty is never acceptable. Let's end all violence. **□

For shame Alex, for shame

Editor:

I just thought that Carleton students, staff and alumni would like to know that Carleton University was slammed on television across North America by Canada's own Alex Trebek.

Good 'ol Al had a contestant from Ottawa on Jeopardy and he took the liberty of asking this fellow Canadian if they had gone to the "dreaded Carleton." Thanks, Alex.

First of all, it is a wonderful thing, (sarcasm interlude), that Trebek felt the need to insult those of us in the pursuit of higher education. Secondly, it is just as pleasant that it is an insult against fellow Canadians.

Alex may be a top-notch spermologist (one who collects trivia), but is he some sort of expert regarding the Canadian university system? You cannot believe everything you read in Maclean's, Al!

Personally, I am offended on behalf of a school that I am proud to attend. I am equally offended that a Canadian in high international standing would use his influence to perpetuate misinformed rumors.

I urge anyone else who feels this way to write CBS, Jeopardy's parent network, requesting either an on-air apology or a written apology to those in any way associated with Carleton.

ing endless hours of The Bugs Bunny Show and Loony Tunes, never realizing the profound ramifications these programs were having on my psyche. I remember hating, just hating, Elmer Fudd with everything my little 10-year-old body had.

He was the scariest cartoon character to haunt my Saturday mornings. He was a maniac! Where did he get off chasing Bugs around like that? And all the while wearing that stupid fucking hat of his and stroking that double-barrel 12 gauge like it was his... well, I'm sure you get the idea.

Anyway, just thought I'd let you know what a good job I thought Zavitz did in helping me realize where my severe paranoia of Preston Manning stems from. Although Zavitz did not state outright that Manning and his Reformers are "Fudds" per se, parallels can easily be drawn.

Remember what Zavitz so rightfully pointed out: "They don't beat you with intelligence. They swamp you with numbers and homogeneous intolerance." If Manning gets in on Oct. 25, take Zavitz's advice, bunnies, and run for the hills, 'cause th-th-that'll be all folks.

Re: "Vegetarian for a healthy world," The Charlatan, Oct. 14, 1993.

This article expounded a doctrine which was carefully designed to elicit a highly emotional response by glossing over the reason certain techniques are used on animals. Before anyone decides to give up meat forever, they should have complete information and not just propaganda.

Many of the practices which this article found to be so reprehensible are usually necessary for the good of the animal. For instance, the sharp tips of chick beaks are removed to prevent the chicks from pecking each other to death.

These pecks are thrusts powerful enough to draw blood and even daze chicks pecked on the head. Eventually some of the chicks die from the abuse. So, while it is sad that some chicks die from the trauma of having the sharp tips removed, it is preferable to the alternative of even more chicks suffering far worse deaths.

But, the article didn't mention that Nordidit explain that the way the "chemicals and drugs prolong their (the animals') lives" is to make the animals less susceptible to disease and parasites which weaken them and at times, kill them. Disease would run rampant in domestic animals without antibiotic and pesticide treatments because domestic animals lack natural resistance. So while the farmer does benefit from treating the animals with drugs and chemicals, so do the animals.

On our family farm we cared for our animals, not simply because they were our income, but because we were truly concerned with their well-being. I'm not suggesting that terrible practices do not occur on larger corporate farms, but I think it's important that people realize that not all farming practices are detrimental to the animals involved.

GODDESSES

ISIS

by Mc Gannon
Charmian Starr

Isis gave birth to the sun and shielded Pharaohs in her lap. Selene carried the moon across the sky in a chariot drawn by winged horses.

Kali Ma created the magic letters of Sanskrit; the ancient Hindu alphabet, which she had inscribed on a necklace of skulls around her neck.

These are no ordinary women. They're goddesses. And women are taking them back.

Taking them back because a very, very long time ago, it is believed that both women and goddesses may have commanded more power and reverence than they do today.

"Women in general haven't been respected enough in the last couple hundred years and it's a way for us to take our power back," says Leanne Haze, a Wiccan high priestess and goddess-rock singer who ran as a Green Party candidate in Toronto's Beaches-Woodbine riding in the federal election.

The evidence for this revival won't smack you in the face, but goddesses are there in stories and images from many different cultures.

You'll find them in stores on cards, calendars, posters, or T-shirts, through appropriated goddess images like Botticelli's Birth of Venus.

Bookstores' shelves are starting to weigh heavy with their presence — Civilization of the Goddess, The Once and Future Goddess, When God Was a Woman, The Goddess Re-Awakening, Women Who Run With the Wolves — even a tour guide called Goddess Sites: Europe.

Goddesses are present in zines and journals like the Compost Newsletter, Green Egg and New Moon Rising, dedicated to the dialogue and debate that surrounds them.

You can even call them up on a computer through a pagan bulletin board service, where people from around the world are conversing about them.

But goddesses make their presence known mainly in areas where they are harder to spot — in households with private altars, in small groups of people who come together to worship them, in the minds of individuals who draw upon their stories for strength and affirmation.

"What I'm seeing is people who are looking for ritual that's meaningful, for a symbol that's dynamic," says Evelyn Huer, who works at the Ottawa Women's Bookstore. She says women are finding that in books about goddess worship.

"I think it's becoming more popular but I think there's definitely always been a ground movement there."

The goddess movement is difficult to define, simply because without a scripture or a set of principles to follow, it is fluid and adaptable. Goddesses are worshipped in many different forms — through organized worship and alternative

However, Rabinovitch says she thinks Wicca and neopaganism may be the fastest growing religion in Canada, outside religions which are growing because of immigration, like Islam or Buddhism.

Tom Henighan, a Carleton English professor who teaches a second-year course on myth and symbol, says he thinks interest in goddesses is growing based on the enthusiastic student response to the goddess content in his lectures. But that's not necessarily positive if it's swallowed up by the mainstream, he says, as evidenced by the tour guide to goddess sites of Europe.

"Everything is vulgarized in our culture and vulgarizing things sometimes kills the mystery," he says. "I don't want the world to become a theme park. I don't want to have to take my trip in the theme park of the world with a guidebook to goddess culture."

The growing interest in goddesses may be because women are looking for a point of reference they can understand, says Nihal Mazloun, a Montreal woman who makes jewelry with images of goddesses and sells it at women's festivals and the Darshan Gallery in Ottawa.

"I think that women are fed up with what is around them, with what is made by men," says Nazloum.

Some people who are fed up with what is around them are looking to a time before Christianity, when it is believed that women played more of a central role in the religious and political life of some cultures.

Of course, as with many religions, says Henighan, the evidence of matriarchal cultures is sketchy, based on scant archaeological findings, mythology and customs. What we do know is that goddess stories were important, although if cultures with power vested solely in women existed is questionable, he says.

The best evidence of a goddess culture where women had at least some power is in ancient Eastern Europe, says Henighan, although there is evidence of similar cultures in India, the Near East, England and Northern Europe.

Dufresne says in agricultural cultures like the one in Eastern Europe, where the fertility of plants and animals was important, women played a big part in social and political groups as "the givers and nurturers of life."

Sexuality was thus a very important part of being religious in goddess cultures because they had fewer "erotic hang-ups," says Henighan.

"If you bring nature back into the picture and bring women closer to the god-like then sexuality and birth become enormously more sanctified," he says. "In the ancient cultures, the fact that the goddess sanctified... intercourse that would be done in the fields in order to create the growth process, it would just change one's whole perspective on the world."

everywhere, not just the earth," says Henighan. A Warrior culture of hunters took over with invasions by Greece and Crete.

"They were basically patriarchal so they imposed their gods, their pantheon of gods, on the older cultures," says Henighan.

He says patriarchal cultures which took over lacked some important ideals of the goddess culture — a better respect for nature and the earth, a more egalitarian system, a pacifistic view of life and a more celebratory society.

The power of the goddess is still evident in Greek mythology, Henighan says, but so is the evidence of how the males imposed their power on them. Henighan mentions how the Greek god Zeus was the first-recorded wife beater and was "flagrantly" unfaithful to Hera.

Nevertheless, goddess worship did not die out.

"You can't just wipe out thousands of years of beliefs that people have. There were no mass methods of controlling minds. In little local shrines people still believed in the goddess," says Henighan.

DuFresne says goddess worship survived, but it was changed and appropriated by Christianity. For instance, the Virgin Mary is believed to be a composite character of Mariamne the Semitic God-Mother, Juno the Blessed Virgin, Aphrodite-Mari, the Syrian version of Ishtar, and other versions of the goddess, according to Barbara Walker, author of The Woman's Encyclopedia of Myths and Secrets. Despite his enthusiasm for the movement, Henighan warns that there may be an element of wishful thinking in material about the goddess.

"I'm not denying that there are goddess religions or that goddess worship is very strong around the world or that the myths are not full of stuff that offers a totally different perspective to the male," says Henighan. "I'm only saying that it may in the long run turn out that there aren't any historical goddess cultures I don't know. But even if there aren't, what the women are doing is valid. Because what they're doing is creating a mythology which is important for them and my belief is that everybody creates a mythology." As for what the goddess means to him, Henighan says he can only wildly speculate.

"It's possible that the goddess worship, because of its ancient lineage and its practice over centuries, somehow taps into some kind of power that relates to natural processes which are lost in other religions," says Henighan. "So maybe the goddess, ultimately, is some kind of spiritual power."

For Mazloum, goddess symbols and stories are empowering. She wears Maat, the Egyptian goddess of justice, on a pendant because she sees so much injustice in the world. "I try to wear it to protect myself and to give me strength," she says. "They have some kind of magic in them I think." For Haze, the goddess is everywhere and everything. "The goddess is all form but she's also way beyond form. She is the matrix which allows ideas to take form."

For DuFresne, the goddess is intangible.

"I see the goddess a lot more as a feeling and a process. The feeling I get when I'm with other women in ritual working through what it means to apprehend the divine in our own terms."

WOMEN

Pre-Vedic, primal Goddess Tara was known from India to Ireland and worshipped as "savior" and "star."

central," says Lucie DuFresne, manager of the Occult Shop in Ottawa and a PhD student in religious studies at the University of Ottawa. "Some put an equal emphasis on the goddess, some don't. Some ignore the male aspect completely — sort of a reaction to the patriarchal, hierarchical religions we have had in the past."

"Then you have women who are very active in developing a spirituality which is female-based and female-defined, and that can be anything from the totally personal to extremely organized."

DuFresne says this activity can range from women working to reclaim the female aspect of patriarchal religions like Christianity to studying the power structures of old goddess cultures from a feminist perspective. She says people in the goddess movement are trying to develop a spirituality based on a respect for nature and a unity between the male and female, thus promoting ecological awareness and equity between genders.

That's part of what Haze says she's trying to do for the Green Party.

"There's a spirit in the earth, and it's a gal, just like she's in you and me," says Haze, whose exuberant voice sings praise of the goddess even when she's talking. "Working for the Green Party is like working for the goddess because it's protecting the earth."

A sacred respect for the earth is one common element in different forms of goddess worship, according to Starhawk, author of the popular book The Spiral Dance: A Rebirth of the Ancient Religion of the Great Goddess. Other aspects include a belief in the interconnection between everything in the cosmos and the importance of the community before the individual.

More elements, at least in Wicca, include a love for all forms of life, a belief that what you do comes back to you threefold, an acceptance that the world is a balance of opposites and a celebration of erotic pleasure, fostering women's sexuality rather than suppressing it.

"... Women cannot become whole by being yet more passive, gentle and submissive than we already are," Starhawk writes. "We become whole through knowing our strength and creativity, our aggression, our sexuality, by affirming the self, not by denying it."

This is happening in at least five women's spiritual groups now in Ottawa, says DuFresne, who leads the Women's Full Moon Circle and acts as an occasional ritual leader and instructor for the Wiccan Church of Canada.

The goddess movement started rolling in the 1960s and today, it shows no signs of slowing down. The numbers of people who defined themselves as pagan in the 1991 census more than doubled since the 1981 census, says Shelley Rabinovitch, a PhD student in religious studies at the University of Ottawa. In the 1991 census, 6,530 people claimed they were pagan; in 1981 the number was 2,295. This definition included people who said they were witches or neo-pagans, she says, or who believe in a goddess, a goddess and a god, or many goddesses and many gods.

Rabinovitch, who spent a summer travelling across the country to track down witches and neo-pagans for her masters' thesis at Carleton, says according to her research the number may be around 20,000. She says the census numbers are probably low because some people don't want to be labelled as pagan.

"There's no way of putting your finger on it," she says.

Panda Lore

The Panda Game was born in 1955 when Bryan McNulty, an editor at the University of Ottawa newspaper The Fulcrum, decided there was a definite lack of rivalry between the universities of Ottawa and Carleton.

McNulty asked a local jeweller to donate a Panda bear as the Ottawa mascot and then set up a pre-arranged kidnapping to attract newspaper attention for the upcoming football game. The bear went on to become the trophy for the winner. Incredibly enough, the Ravens actually won the first Panda Game 14-6.

Pedro's Exploits

In 1956, some dimwit nominated Pedro for President of the Carleton Student's Council. The Panda lost.

Responding to the hippier times of 1968, Panda organizers changed the traditional Hate Week prior to the game into a more appropriate Love Week. Pedro became a flower child at the tender age of 13.

During half-time in the 1977 contest, five pigs were released onto Lansdowne field from a box marked Carleton Pork Chops. The Ottawa Humane Society pressed charges against the Ottawa students responsible.

After a 24-year career, Pedro retired in 1979 to the Canadian Football Hall of Fame in Hamilton. A copper replica trophy was built to carry on the tradition.

Hello, Anybody Out There?

Total attendance for this year's Panda Game was about 3,500 people. Last year's attendance was 5,324. Crowds peaked in the late seventies, with figures exceeding 15,000.

Good Little Boys And Girls

Both Ottawa and Carleton universities chipped in 110 safety volunteers apiece and 30 police officers were on hand to keep the rowdy crowd — not — in check. Breaking with recent tradition, only one student stormed the field. Goof.

Football men kiss Panda goodbye

3-0 lead evaporates in final quarter failure

by Derek DeCloet
Charlatan Staff

With only 15 minutes of football separating them from their first playoff spot in six years, the Carleton Ravens were struck by lightning.

Not once. Not twice. Three times.

The Ottawa Gee-Gees scored three touchdowns early in the fourth quarter en route to a 21-3 Panda victory at Lansdowne Park Oct. 24.

Ottawa 21 Carleton 3

It had all the hype and implications of a playoff game. The two teams entered the game with identical 2-4 records. The winner would finish fourth, make the playoffs and play Bishop's on Oct. 30. The loser would go home.

The Ravens' collapse was as quick as it was decisive.

"That's the sign of an inexperienced team that cannot keep it together for 60 minutes," said Raven coach Donn Smith of the fourth quarter collapse. "Today, we played 45."

The Ravens had been hanging on to a 3-0 lead since early in the second quarter, when kicker Marco Dinardo hit an eight-yard field goal.

But even that play epitomized the Ravens' frustration on offence. They had the ball on the two-yard line, but were stopped on two consecutive plays and were forced to settle for a field goal.

"Maybe some of the guys thought that (lead) was enough but three points... it's not enough," said Raven tailback Hien Phan, who led the Ravens with 45 yards rushing.

It was good enough until the second play of the fourth quarter, when Gee-Gee quarterback Steve Clarke hit wide receiver Warren Grant for a 20-yard touchdown pass.

Less than two minutes later, Ottawa cornerback Chris Barton picked off a pass by Raven quarterback Sean O'Neill and returned it 65 yards for the touchdown.

When Grant and Clarke hooked up for another touchdown three minutes later, the Ravens were as good as buried.

"The guys got a little rattled (when the score was 3-0)," said Gee-Gee coach Larry Ring. "Then we decided, 'Listen, we've got Warren Grant, he's the best wideout in the league. Let's go downtown to him.'"

But while the defence faltered in the fourth quarter, it was bad timing on offence that ultimately doomed the Ravens.

"We had some untimely interceptions," said Smith. "Our passing game was really hurting us. We knew we had to throw (but) we continued to shoot ourselves in the foot."

Starting quarterback Ray Hubbert hurt his elbow in the first quarter and did not return.

O'Neill took over and moved the ball well at first. When he hit Chris Dornington with a 47-yard pass — Carleton's longest completion of the year — the Ravens completed to have the momentum in the first half. But they were unable to crack Ottawa's defence and get into the end

As the season progressed, we've compared this year's Raven squad against the best and worst Raven teams of the past: the 6-1 1986 squad and the 0-7 1992 team.

Overall, Carleton's quarterbacks were 10 for 28, with three interceptions.

While the Ravens' season was considerably better than last year's 0-7 record, it may be remembered as a season of lost opportunity.

The Ravens were 2-1 after a stunning comeback win over Queen's on Sept. 25. And they could have entered the Panda Game with an even better record, had they not blown a 21-6 lead at Concordia on Oct. 16, ultimately losing 25-21.

"It's a success compared to the past few seasons but some of the games we lost this year were really close," said Phan. "We could've went 5-2."

While Smith has reason to be optimistic about next year — half the team this year was rookies — he couldn't hide his disappointment with the Panda loss.

"It's ended on a bitter note," he said. "We had a nice opportunity to win this game but we let it slip away."

Rugby men bound for playoffs

First divisional title since 1987

by Matt Shurrie
Charlatan Staff

Excalibur-burnt. The Trent Excalibur should have stayed at home. But no, foolishly they came to Carleton on Oct. 23 and were soundly beaten 33-0 for their stupidity.

With the victory, the rugby Ravens win the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's second division for the first time since 1987.

Carleton 33 Trent 0

"The team is very deserving of this honor," said head coach Lee Powell, who was a first-year coach with the Ravens in 1987. "We're all very excited that the club has been able to work hard all season long."

Team captain Mike Rys, playing in his fourth year with the Ravens, was ecstatic about the club's division championship.

"This is the best feeling in the world," he said. "We knew from the beginning of the season that if we played hard, we could get the job done."

The Ravens opened the scoring early in the first half when third-year winger Jim MacKay scored a try and all-star kicker Rys added a successful convert.

Third-year winger Darryl Bellamy scored a try with a 50-yard run later in the half. Rys closed the half with two successful penalty kicks, giving the Ravens a comfortable 20-0 lead.

The second half was no different. Rys added two more three-point penalty kicks and hooker Mike White's try rounded out the scoring 33-0.

A defence not afraid to tackle will help the Ravens against Queen's this weekend.

ALEX BODNAR

Defence, Carleton's calling card this entire season, kept Trent off the board and out of the Raven's zone for almost the entire game.

"The defence is very important for our club," said Powell. "At times, there appeared to be a lack of concentration amongst the players, but whenever Trent pressured us, they turned it up a notch."

With the victory, Carleton advances to the playoffs on Oct. 30 against the first-division champion, Queen's Golden Gaels.

With both defence and offence clicking, a playoff win isn't out of the question.

"In order for us to win, we must go out there and play a full game," said Rys. "If we go out on the field and concentrate and do what we can do, then we will be able to show the first division why we were able to win the second division." □

RANT 'N' RAVEN

Moving up the ladder

by Matt Shurrie
Charlatan Staff

They've got heart, soul and character.

And because of it, this year's rugby Ravens stepped out of the shadow of past failures to finally finish first in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's second rugby division and advance to the league playoffs.

Unlike past years where the Ravens came agonizingly close to a playoff spot only to come up empty — this year's squad came through.

They began the season with a perfect 5-0 win streak. After one heart-breaking 17-9 loss to the Royal Military College Redmen on Oct. 7, the Ravens rebounded two weeks ago to destroy Toronto and Trent this past weekend, clinching the division.

With a record of 6-1, the club improved by two wins over last season's disappointing 4-3 record and renewed varsity interest in rugby.

Who could have predicted it?

Heading into this season, the Ravens' coaching staff wondered whether the team could even compete, let alone win against the other teams in the weaker second division.

With a roster half-filled by first year rookies, pessimists wondered from day one if raw rookies could compete at an intense university level.

But boy did they perform.

Players like Rick Haldane, Andrew Kay and Chad Yates practised hard and — when push came to shove — made fans forget about those who graduated. If it hadn't been for the hard work and determination of such a strong rookie crop, the club would have been hard-pressed for a playoff berth.

With proven veterans like Mike Roe, Jim MacKay and Dave Howard, the Ravens also had a solid nucleus of strong leadership.

With an explosive offensive attack and a brick-wall defence, there were times when the team looked invincible. With mental lapses and rookie mistakes, there were also times when they looked quite beatable. Still, the Ravens worked together and for the most part, played like proven veterans rather than inconsistent rookies.

Mr. Consistency — kicker Mike Rys, captained this year's squad and lifted the team to new performance standards.

Coach Lee Powell and the entire coaching staff need to be commended for the hard work time they put into the club this season.

But the season's not over yet.

Playoff territory has been uncharted for the rugby Ravens since the 1987-88 season when the club went undefeated 7-0. Like the Ravens of that season, this year's club defeated Trent to clinch the division title.

Like the 1987 team, the Ravens will also encounter the 5-1 Queen's Golden Gaels in the first round of the playoffs.

The only difference is this year's club hopes to avenge the performance of the 1987 team, who lost 21-6 to the Golden Gaels.

Field hockey Ravens shut out of the playoffs

2-11-3 record speaks loud and clear

by Kevin Restivo
Charlatan Staff

It was a tough way to end a disappointing season.

The Carleton women's field hockey team finished their season with three losses the weekend of Oct. 22-24.

The Ravens lost to the Waterloo Athenas 1-0 on Oct. 22; 5-0 to the Guelph Gryphons on Oct. 23; and 1-0 to the University of Western Mustangs Oct. 24.

The losses leave the Ravens with a 2-11-3 record, in eighth place out of nine teams in the Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletic Association field

Waterloo 1 Carleton 0
Guelph 5 Carleton 0
Western 1 Carleton 0

hockey league, and out of the playoffs.

Against the 6-7-3 Athenas, the Ravens came out with what seems to be their latest trend. That is, starting strong in the first half. The game remained a scoreless tie until just before halftime when the Athenas got one after some sloppy play in the goaltender's crease. Waterloo banked the goal in off goalie Julie Sudds.

Unfortunately, it also turned out to be the game winner for the Athenas.

"That was a tough one to swallow but, the ball really should not have been in the crease to start off with," said head coach Suzanne Nicholson. "Somebody missed their assignment on that one. Overall though, we played quite well."

The Ravens' second match of the weekend against the 9-5-2 Gryphons saw confusion reign for much of the first half. Carleton continually missed defensive assignments throughout the first 25 minutes and wound up allowing three goals in that span. The Gryphons added two more in the second half and cruised to victory from there.

"We were defensively mucked up most of the first half," said Nicholson. "I told them (the Ravens) at halftime that I couldn't help them out there and that they had to start reading and reacting better. That's where we need some of our veteran leadership to come through."

Defender Christina Matula saw the game differently.

"I thought we played better against Guelph, but Guelph's front line was strong and so was their right side, so it was hard to defend against," she said.

The Ravens rebounded though, with one of their best efforts of the year against the 5-5-6 Mustangs. Carleton stymied the Mustangs with some tough defence but couldn't make good on any of their own chances.

"We really played a great game. We practised our passing techniques all week and it really paid off. We just couldn't score," said injured forward Shannon Hawkins, who watched the game from the sidelines.

The 0-0 stalemate was finally broken with 10 minutes left in the second half, when Western scored a beautiful goal off a penalty corner, which left the normally reserved Nicholson in awe.

"I would've loved to have scored that goal — it was that beautiful," said Nicholson.

Despite the loss, Nicholson called it one of her team's best efforts all year because of the adjustments that had to be made.

"I had to move Laura (Morris) to wing. Sue Bird's shin splints were bothering her so we had to move her to midfield, which hurt our scoring. Also, Julie Sudds' back was still bothering her, so it was good to see we played so well," said Nicholson. □

Three more losses ended the Ravens' field hockey team season on a dark note.

Soccer men watch as the bubble bursts Undefeated season just a dream

by Sarah Richards

They picked a hell of a time to lose. The Carleton men's soccer team finally confronted the spectre of defeat when they lost 3-1 against the University of Toronto Varsity Blues in their last regular season game on Oct. 24 in Toronto.

The loss came after an earlier 4-0 win on Oct. 20 over the Trent Excalibur.

Carleton 4 Trent 0
Toronto 3 Carleton 1

But one goal was all it took for the 7-1-3 Ravens to snatch the Ontario Universities Athletic Association east division title for a second consecutive year.

Prior to the game, Toronto trailed the first-place Ravens by two points and a win by more than three goals would have propelled them into first place. "I'm hoping the loss was good, because then that stigma is out of the way," said Raven goalie Steve Ball, in a sense relieved the team finally lost a game and won't have to play with the fear of blemishing their undefeated record any more.

The Blues controlled the game for the first half, putting away all their goals in the first 25 minutes. Two goals came off headers in the six-yard box, while a third came off a sharp kick from the 18-yard line. Come halftime, the Ravens were down a stunning 3-0.

It was all or nothing in the second half — either the Ravens scored a goal or lost their league title.

"We knew we needed a goal. If we lost 3-0, we would have finished in second place," said Ball. "Everyone was pushing up; I was standing at half with about five minutes left . . . we were so close."

And as the minutes ticked by, so did the Ravens' chances. Forward John Louro missed, sweeper Michael Zaborski had a try, fullback Marty Lauter hit the crossbar — the ball wanted to go anywhere but in the net.

Then, with a minute left, stopper Earl Cochrane's head connected with the ball to score. It was a fitting end to the veteran's five years of regular season varsity soccer.

"In terms of being undefeated, it would have been nice (to beat Toronto), but in terms of the big picture, it was a win," Ball said.

The loss was surprising, considering the comfortable 4-0 win the Ravens managed at Trent University. The zestless Excalibur began the game as if the score was predetermined, leaving the initiative to the Ravens.

Raven midfielder Chris Scuccato was the first to take advantage of the swiss cheese Trent defence, when he sliced through the field, chested a high ball down and placed the ball perfectly in the upper left-hand corner of the net. Scuccato scored again before halftime came.

"They didn't have a genuine striker; I didn't feel threatened during the game," said Ball. He has five shutouts to his credit, equal to his 1992 tally.

"They didn't seem interested in jumping with us or tackling," he said. "For the most part, they seemed disinterested."

Louro scored in the second half when Trent's keeper Serge Desbiens committed himself when he came out to cut down the angle on Raven forward Basil Phillips. Phillips passed off to Louro who shot a low ball to the right.

Carleton's final goal came on a penalty shot by Cochrane. Trent was fouled when Louro was brought down in the box. Desbiens said it was an unfortunate call for his team.

"All the referee saw was our player go up and going forward, and unfortunately the Carleton player did the right thing — he went down. I wouldn't say he dove, but he did the right thing."

After the game, Trent's head coach Marvin Buchan was disappointed, saying the team played to only 60 per cent of its potential.

"We don't have a lot of talent," said Buchan. "What we try and do is work very hard."

Just not hard enough. □

Scoreless draw leaves soccer women sitting in fourth

5-3-2 record is Ravens' best ever

by Bram S. Aaron
Charlatan Staff

The Carleton Ravens women's soccer team has some good news and some bad news and some more good news.

The good news is that the team played to a scoreless tie versus the 5-2-2 University of Toronto Varsity Blues in Toronto on Oct. 23 to finish with an overall record of 5-3-2 — their best in the six-year history of the team.

Carleton 1 Trent 0
Carleton 0 Toronto 0

The tie leaves the Ravens in fourth place in the six-team eastern division of the Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletic Association.

The bad news is the Ravens' failure to win the game means they'll finish behind Toronto and have to play the 8-0-4 Laurier Golden Hawks, who finished first in the OWIAA west division.

Last year the Golden Hawks won the national women's soccer title.

The two will meet in semi-final playoff action at Windsor University Oct. 28-31. Winners of each playoff round move on to the next one, until the championship final. The other good news is that goalie Kristina Bacchi picked up her fourth shut-out of the season.

"I wasn't really tested," said Bacchi. "It was a hard field, not like the muddy conditions we played in last week (against York). (The Blues) only had five or six shots on our net."

"They had a lot of corner kicks," said striker Mary McCormick. "But Kristina always managed to get her hand on the ball or something to clear them out."

Coach David Kent said the double shutout was the first in team history.

"It was a great match between two excellent teams who were both trying to finish third," he said. "Everybody played well. It took the full effort of all 19 women."

"We really wanted to finish in third place," said Bacchi. "We were a bit down (after the game), but we're happy about the results. We figured we did what we had to do."

Looking ahead, Kent is cautiously optimistic about the Ravens' playoff chances.

"There can be more accomplished this season," he said. "If we stay focused, we have a chance to go to the nationals." □

Raven Rumblings

QUOTE OF THE WEEK

"It's sometimes good when a team like Toronto (16-0) gives us a good whipping. It brings them (the veterans) back down to earth."

Field hockey coach Suzanne Nicholson on the internal strife plaguing her team.

BRIEFS

In exhibition action the women's basketball team won once and lost twice at the Ravens' Nest on the Oct. 23-24 weekend. The Ravens defeated Dawson College 57-49 with forward Gillian Roseway leading the team with 15 points. The Waterloo Athenas defeated Carleton 60-44 and John Abbott College beat Carleton 69-36.

The women's water polo team won the Carleton Invitational tournament, defeating the University of Ottawa club 6-4 in the final at the Carleton pool on the Oct. 23-24 weekend. A second Raven squad defeated Queen's 9-8 on a last-second goal to win bronze. Carleton's Marianne Illing was named the tournament's most valuable player.

Four members of the Carleton sailing club participated in the Canadian Nationals on Oct. 23-24 at the Toronto Sailing and Canoeing Club. Sailor Dave Nurse posted Carleton's best finish with a third-place result in the laser class.

YEARBOOK GOOF

Take a peek at page 7 of this year's athletic yearbook. In the bottom right corner of the women's rowing write-up is a lovely picture — of canoeists.

CORRECTION

We're not having any luck with spelling among members of the soccer team. First it was Christine Archambault. Then it was Ian Rowe. Now it's forward John Louro, whom we've been calling John Lauro in every issue this year. Our apologies.

CALENDAR Friday, Oct. 29.

BASKETBALL — The men's basketball team continues its exhibition season at the University of Ottawa Tip-Off Tournament.

Saturday, Oct. 30.

ROWING — The OUAA finals await the rowing team at the Henley Course in St. Catharines today.

RUGBY — The division two champion rugby team travels to Kingston today to kick off against the division one champion Queen's Golden Gaels in their first playoff game since 1987.

SOCCER — The men's soccer team will host the Queen's Golden Gaels in a 1 p.m. match in semi-final playoff action on the Raven Field.

The women's soccer team will travel to Windsor to face the Sir Wilfrid Laurier Golden Hawks in semi-final playoff action.

SWIMMING — The Carleton swim team will participate in an exhibition tri-meet at Queen's University along with the University of Ottawa.

Sunday, Oct. 31.

WATERPOLO — The men's water polo team faces off against the Queen's Golden Gaels in a noon home game looking for revenge. The Ravens lost their season opener 11-5 to the Gaels.

Internal squabbling divides team

by Kevin Restivo
Charlatan Staff

A huge disappointment is how Suzanne Nicholson, the head coach of the Carleton women's field hockey team, describes the season her team just completed.

The Ravens finished with a 2-11-3 record, in eighth place out of nine teams and out of the Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletic Association field hockey playoffs.

That record is a drop from their 3-6-4 sixth place finish just one year ago.

With six veterans returning, including three provincial team members, and an influx of enthusiastic rookies coming in, the Ravens had every reason to think that they could improve on their record of last year.

Unfortunately, they never got on track. Carleton kicked off the year with three consecutive losses to Waterloo, Western and Guelph, and their problems snowballed from there.

Not only did the team have problems scoring goals, but as the losses piled up, so did the frustration.

This frustration surfaced at the midpoint of the season, when Nicholson commented on her team's lack of intensity after a 1-0 loss to the Queen's Golden Gaels, saying that "they just didn't want to win as much as Queen's."

It was at this point Nicholson said veterans needed to show more leadership. Veterans like forward Krista Wilson, defender Suzanne Lachapelle and midfielder Suzanne Bird agreed there was a problem, but that it could be attributed to lack of experience and different levels of competitiveness.

"It's not a big thing," said Bird, after two losses to the top-ranked Toronto and York Oct. 15-16. "We could still use some more drive on the team, but everyone is generally working really hard."

Nicholson disagrees with that assessment.

"Some of our veteran players came back from provincial play this summer with many unreal expectations. They've expected the rookies to step right in and play to the level they're used to," she said earlier this week. "They definitely could have contributed a little more leadership as well as intensity at times."

Nicholson became even more disenchanted with the veterans after the Oct. 15-16 weekend at McGill, even going as far as saying that "it's sometimes good when a team like Toronto gives us a good whipping. It brings them (the veterans) back down to earth."

The Ravens' gloomy season did have its bright spots, even though they were few and far between: Bird's natural hat trick in a 4-1 Carleton win against the Trent Excalibur back on Oct. 16; a 1-1 tie against the second-place York Yeowomen on Sept. 24 was also a pleasant surprise even though York was missing key players.

But despite those few highlights, internal strife reared its ugly head all too often and this season was a disappointment.

"There must be more team unity and we have to get rid of the undercurrents of our problems this year," said Nicholson, after this week's losses to Waterloo, Western and Guelph.

If they don't — they could be in store for another long season.

Lacrosse wins

by Ryan Ward
Charlatan Staff

It is a strange sight seeing a top team like the University of Western Mustangs not show up for a game against a 1-5 team.

But it happened.

Due to a scheduling mix-up, the 1-5 Carleton lacrosse club didn't have to play the heavily favored Mustangs on Oct. 23.

"I was a little disappointed that we didn't get to play Western," said rookie attack Shawn Murphy. "We worked on some plays that would prove very effective in the game and we could have given them a run."

The game will not be replayed as long as Carleton defeats the 0-6 McMaster Marauders at Brewer Park on Oct. 30. A win will give them the fourth and final playoff birth against the undefeated 6-0 Guelph Gryphons.

"We're confident we will defeat them like we did earlier this season (a 6-5 win on Sept. 28)," said Carleton coach Glen Harrison. "They have to win by at least two goals to make the playoffs so we are confident we will do well."

Half of last year's Carleton hockey club graduated last spring and left.

But they couldn't stay away.

Those who stayed in town joined together to form the senior R.A. hockey league's newest team — the Carleton kings.

In the first season matchup between the old and the new — no one won.

The Carleton hockey club tied 2-2 with the Carleton graduate kings on Oct. 20 at the R.A. Centre to improve their record to 0-2-1.

Overweight rowers weigh team down

by Janine MacDonald
Charlatan Staff

Carleton's rowing crew has quick hands, powerful legs and long, hard strokes.

But their weight, ill-luck and strong, wintry winds were all against them during the Oct. 23 McGill Invitational Regatta in Montreal — and the best they could do was come away with three third-place finishes.

The problems began when the men's lightweight four hopped on the scales. All together, they were overweight.

"Cut-off for lightweight is 159 pounds. I weigh 175 pounds," said crew member Shawn Houghton.

Rowers like Alyson Chambers were not happy with the men's weight problem. There's a lot of pressure on a rower to maintain their weight, but it's part of the commitment expected in the sport, she said.

"The guys need to know they can't fool around," said Chambers. "They need to take the sport more seriously. I had to diet before this race or we weren't going to row. The guys were 15 pounds over. That's crazy. Commitment to rowing includes weight. If you don't have that commitment, don't row."

Rachel Fallows & Nancy Mariuz raced the heavyweight women's double sculls.

Also overweight was women's novice eight coxswain Jillian Kohl, who weighed in at 120 pounds. The coxswain is the little person with the loud voice who steers the boat and is expected to weigh between 100 and 110 pounds.

With the extra weight, the women's novice eight crew placed last among five in their heat.

Ill-luck also dodged the Carleton crew. In the men's novice eight race, the McGill boat came too close to the Carleton shell and both boats crashed oars. Carleton was forced to stop and re-start and ended up placing fourth among five boats in the race.

"We were cheated out of a good race," said crew member Peter Petrovic. "There's rules to games. Rules should be followed. McGill hit our boat and they should have been disqualified. We were rowing 120 per cent at the beginning to catch up, but we just couldn't."

Carleton wasn't the only university with rowing problems.

During the same race, as Queen's rushed through the course, one of their rowers was launched into the icy water when his blade got caught in a wave — an experience rowers call "catching a crab."

In the finals, three Carleton crews finished with top three results.

The men's heavyweight crew consisting of Brian Brown, Brian Jewell, Jim Luker, Dave Zieba and coxswain Jenn Clarke battled with Toronto's Erindale College for third place. With 500 metres left in the 2,000-metre race, they powered on into third behind Trent and Queen's.

"I wish I was just a bit fitter," said Dave Zieba, as he stepped out of the boat. "The cross-wind makes it hard to set up. I'm happy about our performance. We've come a long way in a short time."

After placing third in the lightweight women's four with cox, rowers Nicole Lebon, Sarah Mullin, Josée Paquette and Chambers had mixed emotions.

"What a headwind," said Lebon. "It was like rowing into a brick wall. But we smoked Ottawa U, and that's all that counts."

But it was Trevor MacKay's third place finish in the men's single sculling which captured everyone's attention on Saturday.

"I was very impressed by Trevor Mackay," said Carleton rowing head coach John Ossowski. "He was the outstanding performer today."

Earlier in the day, Mackay had cruised to a single scull heat victory in a time of 8:59.22. In the finals, only a strong cross wind and a poor lane position held him back from repeating that feat.

Ossowski, with rowing expertise from the Commonwealth Games, the World Championships and the 1988 Olympics, said Carleton performed well on Saturday considering they've only been together for six weeks.

"It's always an experience-building progress," he said. "I think if we can get the crew to do some hard work over the winter, and improve the fitness level, we should have a really competitive crew in the spring." □

ANDREW CASH

Acclaimed singer/songwriter Andrew Cash first made a musical splash with seminal Toronto punk outfit L'Etranger in the early '80s. Five years and three EPs later, Andrew went solo, soon signing with prestigious label Island. His Time And Place and Boomtown albums reflected his evolution as a songwriter, and he now greets us with his finest work yet, Hi (on Sumo Productions/MCA). "We wanted to capture the actual sound of the band," explains Andrew. The power of Cash and his new band can now be witnessed on their extensive tour with Spirit Of The West.

Loverboy, you'll never be lovermen

by David Hodges
Charlatan Staff

Loverboy
Penguin Rock Bar
Oct. 22

a small sidewalk sign stood precariously in front of the Penguin. The sign itself was rather ugly, but what it had to say was beautiful—LOVERBOY. LIVE. TONIGHT. PLEASE LINE UP BEHIND THE SIGN.

Oh man, could this be true? I've never been a very lucky person. Doom and misfortune seem to plague me like the bastard institutions of this society plague the walkways of our streets, making it unsafe for children and cats. If LOVERBOY was actually here, this was truly the sweetest dream from which I did not want to awaken.

Walking into the room, one could not help but feel the tackiness of the '80s revisited. Memories of parachute pants, acid wash jeans, Peter Pan boots, and various zipper-accessorized articles of clothing were brought back to startling life. It was rather frightening.

Still, among all this goofiness, there was a magical presence of some sort in the room, an indescribable aura, a pulsating electricity if you will. The whole room was buzzing with anticipation and expectation. The tension was so thick you could cut it with a dull spoon.

Being the literary evangelist that I am, I felt there was something newsworthy about this event of the millennium. I had to let the rest of the world feel the love I was experiencing. With the determination of a moose, I began asking people to describe what strange, magical force had drawn them to see LOVERBOY.

Ron Strieper, a visiting neighbor from Holland, described the concert event as the realization of a 10-year dream. He stumbled upon a cassette of LOVERBOY

Mike Reno and Loverboy: next stop: Las Vegas!

10 years ago and has been infatuated with them ever since. The only negative comment he had was that hash wasn't legal here, but nothing could ruin this night.

Annie Bissonnette, looking back on her high-school years and seemingly choking back tears of joy, could only say, "Remembering the music!" At that point, she seemed embarrassed by her sudden outburst and turned away from me, back into the dark coolness of the night scene.

It was 10:23 p.m. They were late. But, in a truly dramatic entrance, LOVERBOY became one with the stage. Like a group of well-seasoned pros, lead singer Mike Reno led the band into a musical odyssey of intangible delights. People swayed to the magical euphoric beat, and the room began to spin with deliciousness. A dingy tavern had been transformed into a garden of love.

The opening number immediately had the crowd begging for more. Playing harmonica with the feverish intensity of a man on fire, Reno delighted the crazed crowd. This was certainly a much harder, grittier band.

The days of playing stadiums might be behind them, but my God, they were awesome. The constant pulsating beat of the drummer kept the crowd fixated—he played those skins like a wild cheetah. The crowd could be heard chanting repeatedly, "Ya baby," "Go baby," and "Oh, baby."

Though at times Reno looked like a pathetic half-assed version of Gordon Downie and Stevie Wonder combined, one could not deny the sexual energy of this rock demigod. Women danced madly around him while men admired from afar.

One disappointed female fan described

Reno as having three chins, and while this band was certainly showing its age, most people didn't seem to care.

An excruciatingly long guitar solo was at first mildly entertaining but eventually made me want to vomit. However, Reno, being the master that he is, quickly won back the crowd with this statement, "The only way you can tell it's Canada is because the crowds are fuckin' insane. Yea, let's go."

When it seemed nothing could top that moment, LOVERBOY played "Turn Me Loose," "Lovin' Every Minute of It" and "Everybody's Working For The Weekend." An onslaught of this magnitude could only be compared to few groups—The Beatles and Rough Trade come to mind. The band was truly in fine form, high-fiving each other constantly.

Before anybody could even react, they were gone. A standing ovation quickly brought LOVERBOY back on the stage, and then they really blew the roof off the Penguin. Reno addressed the audience: "Ottawa, nice to see you again. I mean that," with the most heartfelt warmth imaginable.

Reno found it quite hot up on stage during the encore, but didn't seem to mind because according to him, "That's what rock is all about. The heat."

LOVERBOY finished the set with "The Kid Is Hot Tonight." The perfect finale. After such an emotionally draining experience, I was glad it was over.

But then something happened. Something really bad.

They wouldn't stop. They came back on the stage again. What were they doing? They started doing this weird keyboard solo that seemed to last an eternity. But it didn't end there, it just wouldn't stop. I don't know why.

I began to lose every semblance of my sanity. This band wouldn't go away!

After finally escaping the club, I confronted my feelings and realized that was just part of the LOVERBOY experience. LOVERBOY takes you through the whole spectrum of emotions—love, hate, loathing, adoration, nausea. I'll never forget it.

Just havin' some fun in the elevator

by Mike Ramanuskas
Charlatan Staff

A thief dashes into an elevator hoping it to be his passage of escape. A pregnant woman goes into labor while trapped in the elevator of a hospital. Two children send an elderly woman on a tour of the Rideau Centre via the elevator.

These scenarios are part of a short film about elevators (yes, elevators). The film, Going Down, is being produced and directed by second-year Carleton film student Bill Melnyk.

The first thing I wondered was what kind of crazed person would be so inspired by elevators that he would go as far as to create a movie about them.

Melnyk remarks he was always fascinated by how unusually people behave in their actions and mannerisms while riding in them.

Putting his Sociology 100 training to the test, he decided to further study this phenomenon of human behavior with hands-on research.

Claiming to have ridden in over 50 elevators watching people while developing the script for this film, he feels he has gained quite an insight in the area of elevator behavior.

"There's probably not an elevator in the city I haven't been in," says Melnyk.

Chosen by the Independent Film Co-operative of Ottawa (IFCO) as one of five productions it is sponsoring, Melnyk's project is still in the early stages of filming. He is hopeful that his film will be a success, as is his production staff, composed entirely of volunteers, including Randy Guest as first assistant director and Mike Tier as cameraman.

His somewhat unorthodox methods stray from typical conventions in mainstream movie-making. His compilation of five scenarios, filmed in both black-and-white and color, will be no longer than 15 minutes in length.

Going Down is also somewhat unique in that it has no speaking parts, something Melnyk says he wanted to stay away from since the film's conception. Instead, it will have an original jazz music score in the background composed by local composer Rowle Hugh. This choice, he claims, also opens his options to foreign film festivals, where dialogue in English can act as a language barrier.

Filmed on location throughout Ottawa, Melnyk even went as far as to build a set for an elevator in the garage of his parents' house, complete with collapsing walls so that each shot can be different.

In doing this he strove to get the elevator's perspective of how it would see a situation unfolding within it.

Melnyk says he is happy that short films are finally getting recognition. This helped by outlets like the short feature Liquid Television spots on Much Music.

Going Down is scheduled to be finished by mid-December and will be part of a screening of IFCO-sponsored films tentatively scheduled to play at the Bytowne for the beginning of next year.

Melnyk hopes to eventually enter his work in the Montreal Film Festival's student film competition in the near future and from there he sounds enthusiastic to enter his work in other festivals.

The Charlatan Pub Crawl Extravaganza BIG SCARY CITY

by Joséé Bellemare
Charlatan Staff

Ottawa and Toronto don't even compare when it comes to the bar scene.

After spending one night of clubbing in Toronto, I'll never look at Ottawa bars the same way.

The first club I went to in Toronto was RPM on Jarvis Street. The cover charge was $5, which is a bit more expensive than the usual $2 charged by Ottawa clubs, but it's nothing to fret over.

This huge club was packed with college and university students all staring in one direction — at the go-go dancers. I don't know why they were bothering to stare since they weren't very good. The dancers, clad in short shorts and black bras and standing on two platforms on each side of the DJ, showed very little enthusiasm in their dancing.

In the meantime, techno and house music blasted out of the huge speakers at the seemingly bewildered and bored crowd.

Standing out in the centre of the dance floor were a few people in strange costumes. One of the them sported a floppy black and white polka-dotted hat, black and white polka-dotted bell bottoms and large black and white striped platform shoes.

A tall black man wearing a long black home-made skirt with running shoes was dancing with a lady in a yellow and orange flowered dress and brown clogs. Her uncombed hair was laced with pink barrettes. Other people were wearing fake bright-colored afros.

If people dared to dress this way in Ottawa, they would be laughed out of the club. Ottawa clubbers tend to be much more conservative. Cafe Deluxe on Dalhousie Street and The Pit on Rideau Street may boast a more extravagant clientele, but they're still not as wild as some of the people at Toronto bars.

At about 2 a.m., I left this club and went to an after-hours party at Catch-22 on the corner of Adelaide and Spadina. The same RPM music rumbled through the club.

Bouncers charged whatever they pleased. Although the people before us were charged $2, my friend and I had to pay $3. Three dollars is actually cheap. A private club party in Ottawa can cost up to $10.

Catch-22 was quite the place. It was a small basement with many of the same people from RPM, including the polka-dot man. My friend, who knows the Toronto club scene, mentioned that most of the people in the club were using the drug ecstasy. It makes people very happy and gives them the urge to dance all night long. Afterwards, an urge to partake in sexual activities at someone's house is not uncommon, or so I hear.

One of the go-go dancers from RPM was at Catch-22. She sported thick blue eyeshadow with fake eyelashes. Her big lips were covered generously with red shiny lipstick. Her attire was scarce — striped shorts revealing half of her buttocks and a black leather bra. She sat in a chair applying lipstick to two girls with long braids. Afterwards they all began kissing, with generous amounts of tongue showing.

One of the girls noticed me watching them. This very happy camper came over to me to tell me the go-go dancer she was kissing was actually a man. When she finally left me alone, I was relieved.

All these extravagant happenings wouldn't happen in Ottawa clubs unless it was a gay/lesbian bar. Maybe it does in some clubs or house parties, but I haven't seen it.

It's too bad people in Ottawa seem to be afraid to express themselves as freely as they do in Toronto. It would make Ottawa more of an exciting and interesting place to live in. □

I walked with the elephants

by Susie Haley
Charlatan Staff

"It is only the strongest bulls that are able to mate with a female."

The bull gets a huge rush of testosterone into his system and becomes aggressive and sexy.

They always take in and process information before reacting.

They rumble to each other for reassurance.

When they meet, they "clash tusks, mill around and urinate."

No, this is not a description of Oliver's on a Wednesday night.

These are actually excerpts from a lecture called Out of Africa: Battle for the Elephants, conducted by Dr. Iain Douglas-Hamilton at the Museum of Nature Oct. 19.

As I bided to the lecture, I had images of stuffy old professors discussing average gestation periods and rates of food consumption — not the best way to kill a Tuesday afternoon. Instead, I entered into the world that Douglas-Hamilton and his wife, Oria, have shared for over 20 years.

Douglas-Hamilton is like the Jane Goodall or Dian Fossey of the elephant world. And, he didn't discuss gestation periods, although I did get to see a slide of copulating elephants — pretty impressive!

Douglas-Hamilton, who has written two books with his wife called Among the Elephants and Battle for the Elephants, started off by describing the matriarchal, tribe-like behavior of the animals.

Elephants live in large family units of which the female is the head. They are quite similar to humans in that they have a long childhood, followed by puberty in their teens, and can live to be 60 to 70 years old. Douglas-Hamilton maintains that elephants have a sense of self and death, and have a high level of communication.

He went on to say that "there's something very close to compassion in elephants." To support this, he told a story about a Somali man who was wounded by an elephant. The stood over him for an entire day, lightly rubbing his face with her trunk, to protect him until help could arrive. And for all you lovers of Dumbo, mother elephants really can lift their babies, especially when they are in danger.

Douglas-Hamilton originally went to Africa over 20 years ago to study population numbers among the elephants, but he became deeply involved when he realized the extent of elephant poaching. At one point, the accompanying slide showed a field of illegally obtained tusks that would have easily filled Brewer Park.

The good news is that poaching is on the decline; the bad news is that there is an even greater problem: human overpopulation. "We're set for an extinction spasm more acute than anything we've seen since the dinosaurs," says Douglas-Hamilton.

The human overpopulation on the African continent has greatly limited the space elephants have to roam freely. It has also limited the number of elephant watering holes, forcing elephants to begin stealing water from reservoirs.

But it's not only the elephants that are at risk. Douglas-Hamilton draws a parallel between the elephant and the canary in the coal mine warning of the presence of gas. He stated if the elephant is going down, so, too, is the environment.

In order to help, Douglas-Hamilton recommends that we keep pressuring the Canadian government to support Canada's ban on elephant ivory as well as providing family planning services for those African countries that request it.

My advice to everyone is to watch out for future lectures at the Museum of Nature. If they're as good as this one, they're a perfect way to spend a Tuesday afternoon. □

The (not so) dark sounds of the House of Love

by Blayne Haggart
Charlatan Staff

The new House of Love album will come as a shock to long-time followers of the band. Oh, this English band still has Guy Chadwick's distinctive vocals and the group sounds as good as ever. What will shock is the cover.

More specifically, the title of the album. As in, it has one. Audience With the Mind is their fifth release and the first album that isn't self-titled.

Until now, long-suffering fans have had to make up their own titles based on visual clues provided by the album covers in question. For instance, their last album was called Babe Rainbow because that's what was written below a painting that appeared on the cover.

"We just felt it was necessary," says vocalist/guitarist/driving force Chadwick of the latest album's title. "A lot of people have asked us that."

Plus, it's not like the albums were bereft of a name. "All the albums have some kind of reference point," he notes.

Putting a title on the album is not the only change that has been happening for Chadwick and Co. Five years ago, they started off as a quartet, but they kept having problems keeping a second guitarist. Happily, Chadwick says they've managed to come to terms with their personnel problems.

"We're a three piece now and that's the way it'll be from now on, says Chadwick. "We've always had lineup problems in the past. We've always had a problem trying to find a second guitarist."

"We've done one tour we did it as a three piece in France and it worked really well."

Chadwick (centre) and Co. have finally released an album with a proper title.

This means no session musicians filling in for that second guitar.

"Any work we do we'll do as a three-piece," he says.

Truth be known, one would never guess they don't use a second guitarist on Audience With the Mind. It has their trademark emotional vocals and full guitar sound. It's your "basic guitar, drums, bass, singing," says Chadwick.

Having said that, the band has tinkered with their sound a bit.

"There's more of an acoustic sound on this album," notes Chadwick. "It's something we haven't pushed as much. It's the fastest album we've recorded since our first album and I think that made it sound a little bit different. But essentially it's the same people playing the songs written by the same person. We are our own style and we try to develop with each album."

Anyone who's ever listened to the band will know what Chadwick means when he talks about their style. House of Love songs have a way of hitting that emotional funny bone with the listener, evoking a feeling of understanding on one's most primal levels. The music is both powerful and delicate.

Chadwick, who writes most of their songs, has a gift for picking out a certain age in life and capturing its emotional essence. One need only listen to songs like "Beatles and the Stones," "Shine On" or "Feel" to see this is true.

The songs themselves sound like they were written with someone in mind. Ac-ording to Chadwick, this couldn't be further from the truth.

"No, and I think that's the very reason why they are quite passionate—because I don't have an audience in mind and I don't think about that."

The trio of Chadwick, drummer Pete Evans and bassist Chris Groothuizen, who have been together since the band's inception, have been pretty busy over the past 12 months. It has only been a year since the last House of Love album. They followed that up with a North American tour with fellow label mates and countrymen Catherine Wheel and Ocean Colour Scene.

Now that Audience With the Mind is on the shelves, they're about to begin recording another album between now and Christmas, with a very tentative release date set for the middle of next year. This will probably be followed by another tour.

"It's going to be poppier," says Chadwick of the next album. "We want to make a record that you can play on the radio. It's not a very radio-friendly album, the one we've done. We didn't want it to be, although 'Hollow' has been played on the radio."

Hearing this makes it sound like Audience With the Mind was a dark epic, but it's all relative. Using kettle drums on some songs and slightly heavier guitars on others means it has a slight edge to it. It may not have the elegant beauty of the last album, but it is still a delicate, stirring creation.

With all their creative output, it looks to be a good year for House of Love aficionados. □

Taking pride in political incorrectness

by Blayne Haggart
Charlatan Staff

"The magazine is racist, sexist, ageist, sizeist; you name it. It's totally unpolitically correct, for want of a better term."

Rather than an indictment of it, one gets the feeling that Frank magazine editor Michael Bate couldn't be prouder of his description of his magazine.

For the past four years, Frank magazine has taken sacred cows of both the right and left and desecrated them, be it in their anonymous news morsels or in their sometimes subtle, sometimes crude, and always controversial parodies.

These parodies have now taken on a life of their own, in Random House's Best of Frank, which features the best of the past four years.

As a result of this, Bate, who seems to be more comfortable behind the scenes, has been promoting this compilation.

Of the promotional angle of the new book, Bate says he finds it "a little too establishment. It's a sign that the magazine is getting a little too institutionalized, but I guess that goes with the turf. We're trying to generate some interest in it (the magazine)."

This it should do. Packed into 128 pages are some very deft parodies, including samplings of the regular features like "The Puffster," "Low Definition Television" and Charles Jaffe's always funny cartoons.

Conspicuous in its absence from the collection is the parody ad Frank is most infamous for: the Deflower Caroline faux-contest that caused then-prime minister Brian Mulroney (or Muldoon, as he's known to Frank readers) on national television to threaten to shoot Bate. This has dogged Bate and Frank for quite a while.

When asked about the whole incident, he replied, "Oh, Muldoon. I think he misplaced his prescription drugs or something."

He also doesn't think Mulroney was serious about the whole incident.

"I think it's interesting that Mulroney waited six months to air it out on national TV because he thought he could use that to score points.

"To me, it's the most cynical tactic to try and gain votes, putting his daughter forward at the G7 summit, at Kennebunkport (George Bush's residence in Maine) and at the Tory convention, all within a three-month span. That was what triggered us doing the mock ad.

"It was not by any stretch of the imagination an incitement to (paraphrasing Mulroney) gang-rape his daughter on the cover of Trash magazine. It was buried on page 20 and a lot of people did get it. Subscription sales went up and a lot of people were supportive who understood what we were doing."

As for its absence from The Best of Frank, Bate says it just wasn't good enough. "It was controversial but it wasn't good satire. It wasn't as deft as it should have been. Really good satire to me... you don't throw the pie and hit the victim; you don't victimize Caroline Mulroney. We did that. I acknowledge that. At the time I said it was clumsy."

Although he wishes he could have had more time to get the ad just right, Bate doesn't have any regrets, with this or with the news content of the bi-weekly. These clippings, which have covered everything from the trivial details of Peter Mansbridge's extra-marital affair to Glen Kealey's charges of corruption against prominent Tories, get a lot of heat on two angles: their rumor-like nature and their seeming irrelevance.

"While we don't have the video evidence, if it has the ring of truth we print it anyways. We go out on a limb, which most publications won't." As a result, Frank often gets the stories weeks, if not months, before other papers.

Bate points to their coverage of Pierre Trudeau's latest foray into fatherhood, which he says scooped The Globe and Mail's front page by eight months.

But who really cares about these things? Well, Frank and their subscribers do.

Using an example taken from their pre-election issue, Bate says, "How does Wendy Mesley's anorexia or her weight loss affect us? It doesn't. But Wendy Mesley and Peter Mansbridge and Pam Wallin come into our home every night. We know them, their faces and something about them more than we know our own neighbours, so it's of interest.

"I'm sorry, but I think there are a lot of people, judging by our circulation, who are interested in information about Wendy Mesley. Maybe to some people it's a gratuitous thing, but so what? It's of interest."

It's this combination of irrelevant fact, irreverent humor and printed rumor that makes Frank such a great read and gives it an edge in both style and editorial content that most papers lack.

"It bothers me because newspapers that only print the empirical evidence and scientific proof often times print stories that are of little interest," says Bate.

Summing up Frank's mission statement, Bate says, "I'd much rather have a story that is speculative that makes me think than have some institutional news that I already know. How do you separate truth from rumor until they open up the diaries of Mackenzie King and find out he was talking to his dog and his dead mother? We wait 50 years to find out?"

Michael Bate with all his favorite heroes.

"We're in the business of putting out a bi-weekly magazine. We can't wait 50 years to find out."

Frank Speaks Out:

ON THE NATURAL LAW PARTY:

"We endorsed the Natural Law Party. Doug Henning's our kind of guy. Anybody who could paint the word deficit on the side of an elephant and make it disappear is our kind of guy."

ON THE NDP:

"I don't know, maybe Audrey McLaughlin will have just enough people to form a barber shop quartet (to) sing union songs to seniors in Regina. We're about to find out how many disabled lesbians of color there are in Canada."

ON THE LIBERALS:

"It's like inviting back house guests that you've forgotten how they wrecked your house, stole your sheets, smashed all your china and spent all your credit cards."

ON THE REFORM PARTY:

"These guys are like the Raccoon Lodge: pale, (with) white plastic shoes. It's going to be good because they're oh, so green. And Preston Manning's going to have to become a politician. He got where he is by being the anti-politician. Once he gets to Ottawa he's going to have to become a politician like the rest of them."

ON THE LOSS OF BRIAN MULRONEY:

"We should start a Draft Muldoon movement and get him back; it will only cost us the price of the furniture."

"SPELLBINDING, ASTONISHING.
Bridges' portrayal ranks with the year's finest. 'Fearless' soars!"

LONG DAY IN THE UNIVERSE

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 28 TO THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 4

Thursday, October 28

You only have three more days (including today) to catch Sock 'n' Buskin's presentation of A Hell of A Mess, described as a satirical comedy. It's in the Alumni Theatre at 8 p.m. each night.

CKCU kicks off its 16th annual funding drive today with a Pagan Bash at Zaphod's tonight. What to expect? Prizes and fun. Oh yeah, wear a costume. Five dollars gets you in and the fun begins at 8 p.m.

King Cobb Steelie, the best damn band Guelph's ever produced, plays Creeque Alley tonight. They combine loud guitars and some groovy bass lines. This show is a must-see.

Friday, October 29

This week's Friday lunchtime concert (Alumni Theatre, 12:30 p.m.) features flautist Paula Conlon and guitarist Douglas Reach.

Furnaceface, a band that needs no introduction, is at Creeque Alley tonight and tomorrow. If you haven't seen them yet, this is your big chance.

The Freeway Band plays a unique style of retro-seventies, groove-based rock at the Penguin tonight.

Saturday, October 30

Lock the doors and hide the kids! D.O.A. and Mystery Machine play Zaphod's tonight. It should be fun! Show starts at eight.

There's a new rock band in town. Strange Danger play rock and roll at Ozzie's tonight.

Québécois musical sensation Laurence Jalbert brings her "husky yet clear voice" (or so says the press release) to the NAC Opera tonight at 8 p.m.. Tickets are $19.50, $23.50 and $26.50. (Husky yet clear? Isn't that like rough yet smooth? -ed.)

Tongues and Bones and Sam I Am (the Ottawa version, not the American one) play a special Halloween show at the Equinox at the University of Ottawa tonight.

Sunday, October 31

It's the perfect Halloween double bill at the Mayfair. At 7 p.m. it's the always popular Rocky Horror Picture Show, followed at 9:05 p.m. by Jason Goes To Hell. Yum!

Monday, November 1

Comedy-wise, it doesn't get better than this: Monty Python's And Now For Something Completely Different and The Adventures of Baron Munchausen at the Mayfair tonight at 7 p.m.

Media sociologist and mass communications program director at the University of California, Berkeley Todd Gitlin delivers a talk called "The Unification of the World by Arnold Schwarzenegger and Mickey Mouse." Be amazed as he reveals his stunning thesis that American pop culture is overwhelming the world. It's at 8 p.m. in Room 3380 Mackenzie. It's free.

But so's Wisecracks, a film featuring five excellent female comics. It's at 7 p.m. in the Bell Theatre. It's co-sponsored by OPIRG-Carleton and CKCU. There are free refreshments, too.

Tuesday, November 2

Here's the reading tip of the week, courtesy of The Charlatan's as-of-yet unindicted production manager Kevin

Hey Kids!

Sorry folks, there's no contest this week due to a total lack of creativity from you people. Honestly, you'd think in an institution the size of Carleton someone would know where you lap goes when you stand up. See you next week.

McKay. It's Nobody Nowhere by Donna Williams. Says McKay, "For the first time, the general public receives an unobstructed view into the mind of an autistic in this important autobiographical."

Today through Saturday at 8 p.m. in the Academic Hall of the University of Ottawa, it's Vinegar Tom, a play put on by the University of Ottawa Drama Guild.

Wednesday, November 3

I don't know. Go be yourselves.

Thursday, November 4

Wilde About Sappho is a night of gay and lesbian literature moderated by Marion Dewar. It's taking place tonight at the National Library of Canada at 8 p.m.

As part of CKCU's funding drive, the Bytowne is screening John Water's cult classic Polyester. It's in Odorama so get there early to get your very own scratch and sniff card!!! Show starts at 9:20 and it costs $5 to get in (CKCU gets $2 of every $5).

Carleton's Centre for Aboriginal Education, Research and Culture presents acclaimed Native author Tomson Highway at Porter Hall tonight at 8 p.m. The evening's topic is "Rebuilding Strong Communities — Aboriginal Self-government."

If you've got a listing you want to appear in this handy calendar, drop us a line at Room 531 Unicentre during regular office hours or fax us at 788-4051. Listings must be in by the Friday before publication.

The Ontario Labor Relations Board has ordered certification of all Carleton University Students' Association employees as part of a union.

The board made the ruling on Nov. 2. This means 300 to 350 CUSA employees who aren't already unionized will be a bargaining unit which will negotiate a collective agreement with CUSA.

The decision was released after hearings before the board in Toronto in the last week of August. The board had to rule on whether CUSA unjustly fired Student Academic Action Bureau co-ordinator Wayne Ross and Carleton Women's Centre co-ordinator Renée Twaddle and whether CUSA interfered in a union drive.

CUSA fired Ross July 15 and Twaddle July 29. Both were re-instated by the board in September after it decided they were wrongfully dismissed.

The latest decision sets a precedent because it is the first ruling under Section 9.2 of the Ontario Labor Relations Act, which came into effect on Jan. 1, 1993. The section allows the board to automatically certify all employees in a workplace if it determines the employer interfered with a unionizing drive.

CUSA employees will now be members of the Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 1281, a union of small units of employees mostly in Ontario who work for employers such as student associations and student organizations.

"They (CUSA) fired two union organizers," says Twaddle. "There was just no way in my mind (the board) could not certify. That's what the legislation is for."

Ross says he has already received about seven complaints from CUSA employees concerning employment conditions since the decision was handed down.

"I think what this shows more than anything else is the necessity for a union," he says.

The union guarantees CUSA employees against "intimidation and coercion by anyone in the workplace," says Ross.

"This does not mean, however, that there have to be wage increases necessarily. What it means is that rules can be established so people's rights do not get violated as they have been in the past," he says.

CUSA President Lucy Watson says she anticipated the board would order automatic certification of CUSA employees after the hearings.

"I think (automatic certification) is great because we can move on and start talking about getting things done," says Watson. "I think the right to vote is still a right that has to be protected and fought for and that was the whole reason we were at the board," she says.

Ross says CUSA had a chance to avoid the board hearings. "Ironically, they had the opportunity on Aug. 18 to settle the issue through arbitration. We were willing to settle the issue. But they saw fit to fight."

Brian Robinson, the chief steward of Local 1281, says the CUSA employees are the largest unit in the local. "The board took the stance that you can't jump all over a union drive and get away with it," he said. "It sends a message to employers that whether a union drive is happening or not, the drive is none of their damned business."

Twaddle says CUSA mishandled the situation. "They just weren't learning that they are accountable and that they have broken the labor laws of Ontario."

Ross says there will likely be a meeting of all employees in the third week of November to answer questions and provide information. □

Local business seeks space at Carleton

by Prema Oza

The Carleton University Development Corporation is studying a proposal to have a seasonal entertainment park built on the northeast side of campus near residence.

The proposed place for the park, intended to operate from June until August, is the field between the railway and the path leading to Bronson Avenue.

The proposal includes a "melody tent" for theatre productions, which would seat 2,500 people and take up 25,000 square feet. There would also be an outdoor dance floor, an adult theatre and a children's theatre. The total land absorbed by these facilities would be about 39,200 square feet.

Additional space would be taken up by a sports activity area, a beer tent, and space for food, beverage and craft vendors.

The field area, called the North 40, is about 871,200 square feet, according to Jim Jones, environmental officer and special project officer for Carleton's physical plant.

"The university is currently experimenting with how to make the best use of the land," says David Brown, president of CUDC.

CUDC is a university-owned corporation which attracts and investigates corporate investment proposals for development on campus.

Brown says the university was approached by Bretton Woods Entertainment Inc. in March. Bruce Firestone, founder of the National Hockey League's Ottawa Senators, is the company's president.

"Bretton Woods contacted the university to inquire about the land. Because the land is community-based the university decided to seek views of the local area," says Brown.

The initial proposal had the university and the entertainment corporation sharing the profits with Bretton Woods covering the operating costs, but this was rejected by the university, says Bretton Woods vice-president Barry Lette.

Lette says the university also wanted an increase in the proposed rental amount.

"We have offered to pay the university a substantial amount for rent," says Lette. "It's a net benefit to the university and it is guaranteed."

Lette declined to divulge the amount the corporation would be paying the university.

FoTenn Consultants, hired by CUDC to examine the proposal's feasibility, has met with community groups to talk about it, although students have not been consulted. FoTenn declined to comment on how much they were being paid by the CUDC.

According to Brown, it was up to Carleton President Robin Farquhar to determine who was going to be consulted.

"The matter is for the president," says Brown.

FoTenn director Ted Fobert, says its consultations with community groups were a preliminary attempt to test the waters.

"The concern was on the impact on the neighborhood. It was important to understand how they felt."

CUSA President Lucy Watson says the proposal will be brought to council at the next meeting on Nov. 16.

"We're concerned about the use of green space," says Watson. "It's the last area that large on campus. We're also concerned that we might need that land in the future to make academic buildings, residence buildings or for parking."

Watson says students and CUSA councillors she has spoken to fail to see the need of such facilities on campus.

"The response I got was that it is a ridiculous proposal and that it didn't seem to be a logical one for a university."

She says CUSA hopes to draft a letter stating their position on the preliminary proposal as well as schedule meetings with the CUDC. Watson says it's important to protest the proposal before it's in the final stages.

Nia Challenger, a first-year English student, says students should have been consulted about the proposal and the green space would be wasted by entertainment facilities.

"It's so nice in the summer," says Challenger.

Catherine Jordan, a first-year psychology student, finds the proposal unnecessary.

"It's part of the Carleton property. They should use it for educational purposes. That's what everybody's here for."

Mike Carroll, vice-president of the Rideau River Residence Association, questions the use of the property.

"I know that in the future the North 40 will be looked at for residence purposes," says Carroll. "During the summer there are approximately 60 students in res. The noise would surely bother some students. For conferences, it might deter some people."

Beverley Cruikshank, assistant director of Carleton's housing and food services department, was not aware of the proposal and would not comment.

"It's strange to hear about this from The Charlatan," says Cruikshank.

Cam Robertson, vice-president of the Dow's Lake Residence Association, says the community has a number of concerns about the proposal.

"The association is concerned that it will affect the quality of life and have an impact on Dow's Lake... not to mention we'll be inundated by the noise. Is this how the university wants to make use of its parkland?" says Robertson.

The concerns of nearby residents go further than noise pollution.

Michael Lynch, president of the Ottawa South Community Association, says the university's priorities should be focused elsewhere.

"Why is the university getting into the business of entertainment? There are not enough residences on campus. The land could also be used for academic purposes," says Lynch. □

CUSA executive outlines year's plans

by Michael Mainville
Charlatan Staff

Ever wondered what goes on in that CUSA bubble on the fourth floor of the Unicentre?

Well, we often do. So we decided to find out what the 1993-1994 Carleton University Students' Association executive plans to do this year.

The six-member executive consists of President Lucy Watson, finance commissioner René Faucher, vice-president internal Rob Jamieson, vice-president external Kristine Haselsteiner, director of services Theresa Cowan and director of academics Gary Anandasangaree.

While each executive member has his or her own ideas for this year, they say certain goals are shared by the entire executive, including increased awareness of ethnic diversity on campus and better communication with students.

LUCY WATSON CUSA PRESIDENT

As president, Watson says she works closely with the other members of the executive and university administration to make sure student concerns are well-represented.

Watson says one of her main objectives this year is to "increase awareness of student issues, including the student poverty level." She also deals with safety concerns and says she hopes to raise awareness of these concerns at the administrative level.

Promoting diversity in the students' association is another issue on top of her agenda.

"We feel we need to promote the association to people of color and women and encourage them to get involved with the association and make sure their voice is heard," says Watson.

Watson says she has also worked with the University of Ottawa's students' federation to write a proposal called "Myths, Lies and Half-Truths" to send to Ontario's NDP government. The proposal criticizes the tuition hike of up to 50 per cent proposed by the Council of Ontario Universities.

Watson says she finds it difficult to deal with office bureaucracy as well as scheduling her time to deal with everything. She also has problems finding enough volunteers to help out at various CUSA events throughout the year. However, she says she will continue to do her best to represent student interests.

RENÉ FAUCHER FINANCE COMMISSIONER

Essentially, Faucher's long-range goal is to ensure CUSA continues to experience economic growth.

Faucher, who held the position last year, says CUSA is growing financially. He says he is continuing to bring about growth by restructuring the organization to make it more efficient, by cutting costs and building up Oliver's, the bar owned and operated by the students' association.

Faucher says he also hopes to improve CUSA's image by emphasizing the separation between the political and business parts of the association.

"A lot of initiatives come forward for cost effectiveness, but then CUSA's politics get in the way and they get buried," says Faucher.

"CUSA is not only an association. It is also a corporation."

Faucher also deals with all the businesses CUSA operates, including the Unicentre store, the pharmacy and Rooster's Coffeehouse.

One of the things Faucher says he is working on this year is to make sure the newly renovated Oliver's gets off on the right foot.

"The Oliver's renovations were a big risk, but so far this year has been a banner year," says Faucher. "This September, Oliver's made $160,000. We've broken the record for monthly profits."

Faucher is currently working to change Oliver's format to include more varieties of food and by making it more accessible to students during the day.

One of his other projects is a proposal to change the main floor of the Unicentre.

"We would like to open up the lower level, build some sort of mini-mall and establish new services," says Faucher. He says this could be done at a low cost.

Faucher says he is also trying to expand the Charity Ball by getting more room at the Congress Centre, a better coat check and a casino.

KRISTINE HASELSTEINER VICE-PRESIDENT EXTERNAL

Vice-president external Kristine Haselsteiner is in charge of lobbying external bodies on behalf of Carleton's student body.

She deals with various organizations, such as community groups and the municipal, provincial and federal governments.

Haselsteiner also co-ordinates events for the Canadian Federation of Students and Canadian Federation of Students—Ontario on campus. These events include International Students' Week and Pink Triangle Week.

Haselsteiner says one of her major concerns was informing students about the federal election and to accomplish this she set up an information booth on campus with telephone lines available for students to call local candidates.

Now that the election is over, Haselsteiner says she has been working towards organizing an advisory committee to meet with Mac Harb, the Liberal MP for Ottawa Centre.

She says the committee will attempt to deal with issues pertaining to post-secondary education and Carleton's involvement in the community.

Dealing with the community at large is also one of her main responsibilities, says Haselsteiner.

She says she would like to "open the doors of what Carleton can offer to the community."

The tuition hike proposed by the Council of Ontario Universities is also a concern, says Haselsteiner.

She says she has met with representatives of the provincial government about this.

Haselsteiner says she is also in the process of lobbying the municipal government to have the Route 4 bus pass through Carleton.

By raising awareness at all levels of government, Haselsteiner says she hopes many student issues can be dealt with.

ROB JAMIESON VICE-PRESIDENT INTERNAL

Jamieson's main responsibility is to encourage participation in student government and help make CUSA more accessible to Carleton's student body.

He also works with alumni and university officials on different committees.

He describes his main duty as "dissemination of information." In other words, he is supposed to pass on essential information to the various committees and services that CUSA operates.

Right now, he's trying to organize and create an information package about CUSA.

"It will be about 20-25 pages and will give a brief description of every area (CUSA is involved in)," says Jamieson.

He has recently completed a reorganization of CUSA's constitution which simplified the text.

Jamieson says his biggest problem is the bureaucracy he has to deal with in the CUSA office. For example, Jamieson says he deals with many small bureaucratic issues, such as who books space in Porter Hall or Baker Lounge. He says this ends up consuming a lot of his day.

"The red tape always bogs us down."

THERESA COWAN DIRECTOR OF SERVICES

Cowan oversees the eight services CUSA operates such as the Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Centre, the Carleton Women's Centre and the International Students' Centre. She says she also deals with issues of harassment and inequality on campus.

"Increased awareness of target groups is our main objective," says Cowan.

To this end, she says she is trying to organize educational workshops for CUSA staff dealing with equal treatment for minority groups.

She says she hopes these workshops will help the association's staff deal with the public more effectively.

Cowan says she also organizes various events throughout the year to increase awareness on campus, such as AIDS Awareness Week and Hate Hurts Week.

Cowan says she is lobbying for anonymous AIDS testing on campus, in which a student would not have to give their name or health card number in order to be tested for HIV, the virus believed to cause AIDS.

Anonymous testing means people don't have their results or the fact that they got tested appearing on their medical records, which they may want to avoid because of the stigma attached to the virus.

This kind of testing is available off campus but Cowan says on-campus testing would be more accessible for students.

"This is currently in the initial stages," says Cowan. "We are mostly hoping to raise awareness with this project."

GARY ANANDASANGAREE DIRECTOR OF ACADEMICS

Anandasangaree says many of his objectives for this year have already been accomplished.

According to Anandasangaree, this year's Grad Fair was a success and the on-campus book exchange "managed to break even and even make a slight profit."

His next project involves organizing a course evaluation guide that would be put together with the help of students.

"It would be done through a survey, then all the data would be compiled and put into a format that would be very objective and useful to students," says Anandasangaree.

Another project involves bringing experts to campus to give seminars about preparing for graduate exams like admission tests for law and medical school.

Anandasangaree also administers numerous clubs and societies on campus and is in charge of lobbying the administration to improve the quality of education at Carleton.

Clarification

In "CUSA to hire new safety commissioner," (The Charlatan, Oct. 21, 1993), it was stated that Graduate Students' Association representative Kristin Russel and Carleton University Students' Association President Lucy Watson had met before an Oct. 18 CUSA council meeting. In fact, Russel and Watson did not meet before the Oct. 18 CUSA council meeting. Russel says she tried to contact Watson before the meeting but was unable to.

TAs looking for collective agreement

by Matt Skinner
Charlatan Staff

Negotiations between teaching assistants and Carleton's administration are at a standstill and a strike may be the only solution, says Michel Roy, president of Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 2323.

"The only way anything is going to change around here is through a strike," says Roy.

The local's membership includes teaching assistants, research assistants, student computer consultants and student sessional lecturers at Carleton.

The first negotiating session between the union local and administration was Oct. 14. The local's collective agreement, which establishes wages, benefits and working conditions with the university, expires Aug. 31, 1994.

At the Oct. 14 meeting, university negotiators proposed a freeze on the collective agreement which would freeze the members' wages, says Roy.

The university's proposal to freeze teaching assistants' wages is unthinkable, he says, because of impending tuition increases.

Roy says the local proposed a five-percent wage increase for next year, as well as a tuition freeze. If accepted, a tuition freeze would maintain a union member's tuition for the duration of their employment.

Roy says he was insulted at administration's proposal and outlined this at a second meeting with administration held Oct. 18.

"We think that if they want to freeze the contract, that's fine, but not without a tuition freeze," he says.

David Van Dine, a member of administration's negotiating team, declined comment, saying he wants the local to hear from administration directly, not through the media.

John ApSimon, dean of graduate studies, is also on the administrative negotiating team. He also declined comment on the discussions, saying it was inappropriate to ask questions while negotiations are still in progress.

Jane Fairhurst, a teaching assistant for Carleton's German department, says she thinks a favorable settlement for the local is important.

"I think this issue is worth striking over. It directly affects our ability to return to university," she says.

Van Dine says the need to strike is a long way off.

"As long as we're talking, there's the possibility of a settlement," he says.

But Roy says bargaining is almost a useless exercise since the university just wants to freeze the local's entire collective agreement.

"(Administration) cites the persistent and substantial underfunding of the university as their problem, and we raise the issue that teaching assistants here are suffering from some pretty severe, persistent and substantial underfunding," says Roy.

"Right now, after tuition is calculated, our level of earnings is less than in 1984," he says.

Graduate student teaching assistants earn $7,055 a year, which is equivalent to $26.13 an hour. Undergraduate teaching assistants earn $14.83 an hour.

Fairhurst says most teaching assistants currently need to earn at least $2,000-$3,000 more than they presently earn just to survive through the year.

"If the wages were to stay the same for next year, and tuition were to go up, then it would be impossible to live on the wage that we get and it would be necessary to earn even more money in the summer."

"Given the current economic climate that would be very difficult," says Fairhurst. "Even now it's almost impossible."

Roy says the local has filed for conciliation, with the support of the membership.

"We're expecting a conciliation date for early December," he says.

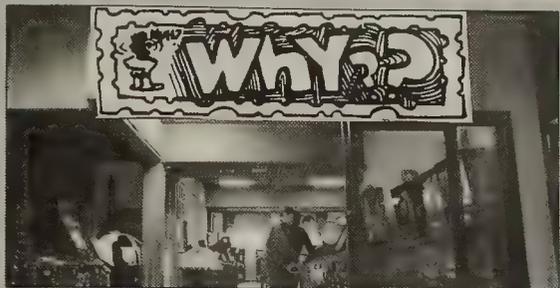

In conciliation, Ontario's minister of labor appoints a conciliator who tries to get the two parties to agree to a settlement.

But Fairhurst says she thinks most teaching assistants are doubtful that anything will be settled during the conciliation process.

If no settlement is reached, the typical procedure is for the conciliator to file a "no board report," says Roy.

This means the parties are so far apart no amount of conciliation is going to help.

Sixteen days after a report is filed, an employer is in a position to lock out employees and the union will be in a position to strike. □

Why are there video cameras in the Unicentre Arcade?

"So the guy working in the booth can scope out babes," according to Dave Falls, a first-year student.

Wrong.

"Are there drug deals going down in there?" asks third-year student Katelynn Packner.

Wrong again.

"I know why," says Cyrus Bulsara, another first-year student. "Someone I know from high school broke a joystick."

Sorry Cyrus, you too are incorrect.

So why are there video cameras in the arcade? Well, according to one of the managers, Chris Kupira, the cameras are there to monitor high-school students using the arcade, since some of them were caught stealing change in the summer.

Apparently some of these students were attaching a magnet to a string, dropping it down the money slot and pulling up quarters one at a time.

When asked how much money has been taken this way, Kupira says "not much money gets taken; it's just a real pain in the ass."

Security cameras to relieve a pain in the ass...

If they can install a few cameras in the arcade to monitor high-school kids, why can't they do the same for the tunnels? □

Native professor shares experiences

Patricia Monture-OKanee has a powerful, personal message about contradictions aboriginal people experience in academia and the Canadian justice system.

Monture-OKanee, a Mohawk woman and a law professor at the University of Ottawa, spoke to a group of around 30 students at Carleton on Friday, Oct. 29.

The lecture was called, "Surviving the Contradictions: Academia and the Aboriginal Tradition." Monture-OKanee added the subtitle "Welcome to My Life," because she said she felt it was important for people to know that her identity as a Mohawk woman is an inherent part of her experiences.

Aboriginal peoples are faced with many cultural contradictions in the university system, said Monture-OKanee.

"There's this whole system of expectations of academic style—things that were created without the participation of aboriginal people."

Monture-OKanee said the aboriginal way of maintaining knowledge is through an oral tradition. Information from oral knowledge is not usually considered a "real" source, because it is not frequently transcribed into books, she said.

Monture-OKanee expressed frustration over the lack of "legitimate" reading materials written by aboriginal peoples. As a contributor to the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, Monture-OKanee said she finds herself confronted with a lack of academic sources for her research on aboriginal women and the law.

"I certainly can't go to the law library and look up 'aboriginal women and justice' and actually find aboriginal women speaking.

If I could find one or two things, they probably already had my name on them... Aboriginal experience does not fit into the legal paradigm."

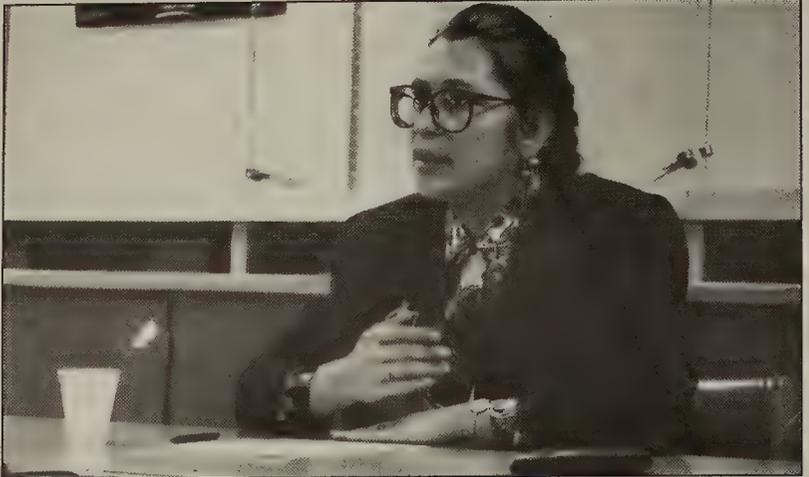

Monture-OKanee said she has faced numerous editorial dilemmas within university. She described how she wrote in the first person, using "I" for an article on aboriginal women and violence because she was writing from personal experience.

Her editor erased the "I's" because it didn't conform to proper academic standards.

"It was like being academically raped. I get back this story about my life, my Mohawk experiences, my woman's experiences, and I'm gone. I didn't even sound like me," she said.

Monture-OKanee also criticized official meanings in legal language. For instance, she said Mohawk people define the word 'law' as "the way to live most nicely together." In contrast, she describes the institutional definition of law as conflictual.

"The two legal systems are so different because the dominant system, the non-aboriginal system, presumes that there is conflict and that laws are going to be

Patricia Monture-OKanee survives cultural contradictions.

CHRIS NUTTALL SMITH

about those conflicts and settling those disputes."

The aboriginal system presupposes that the reason there is law is because people want to live together in harmony, she said.

Monture-OKanee said she does not discourage participation in progressive action.

She encouraged people to challenge the university system, to make curriculum more representative of different cultures. She said her intention is to make people aware of the harsh realities of exclusion.

"I'm not advocating not to go to university and become a professor. I'm saying know the reality when you get there and understand that you're not getting out of the trenches. You're getting into a bigger trench if this is what you're planning to do."

Monture-OKanee said she is aware her position as a professor has given her privilege and legitimacy.

She said it has allowed her to maintain her integrity as a Native woman.

"I am indeed very, very, privileged when I think about where a lot of my sisters sit, where my brothers sit... I think about the poverty of reserves or the cold realities of jail cells. That's where my heart rests." □

Man charged in library assault

A man was charged with assault and illegal use of university property on Thursday, Oct. 21.

A library staff member spotted a man lying on the floor under a desk, fondling a woman's legs and ankles, says staff sergeant Bill Blake of the Ottawa Police. The man was apprehended by a campus safety officer in another part of the library.

A security poster was circulated on Oct. 19 about a similar incident in the library Oct. 17.

Len Boudreault, assistant director for the department of university safety, says the man is not a student or staff member.

Michael Garvey, a 40-year-old Smiths Falls man, was charged, says Blake. Police are investigating the matter and further charges may be pending. □

Len Boudreault, assistant director of the department of university safety, says although the offence has been treated as a student prank in the past, it is now being taken seriously by the department.

"In the future we will be laying charges, and the charges will be criminal," he says.

Campus security will be actively looking for the misuse of fire alarms, says Boudreault. □

Car thefts on rise

Thefts of cars and valuables in the parking garage are becoming a problem, says Len Boudreault, assistant director of the department of university safety. Here are seven precautionary steps to follow put out by campus security:

1. Never leave your vehicle unattended with the engine running.
2. Keep your vehicle and house keys on separate rings. Do not mark keys for easy identification and do not attempt to hide extra keys in your vehicle.
3. Install a good alarm system in your car.
4. Never leave valuables such as wallets, purses, credit cards, jewellery or cheque books in your vehicle.
5. Never leave valuables unattended on roof racks.
6. Engrave identification marks on valuable items such as stereo equipment, CB radio, speakers etc.
7. Mount tape decks and other stereo equipment out of sight. □

Western j-school saved by BOG vote

by Sara-Lynne Levine
Charlatan Staff

In a surprise decision Oct. 29, the board of governors at the University of Western Ontario voted not to close that university's graduate school of journalism.

This puts to an end plans for Carleton's journalism school to absorb some of the faculty from Western's school.

Western's board voted 13-12 to overrule the Sept. 29 decision of the university senate to close the journalism school.

For Peter Desbarats, the dean of the graduate school of journalism, this is good news.

"We are very pleased," said Desbarats, hours after the decision had been reached. "Members of the board really thought about it and the reasons to close the school just weren't there."

Desbarats said the decision of the board solidifies the journalism school's place at Western.

"The state of the school is probably stronger now than before the vote," he said.

The move to close the school began in April. The university administration said the school was a low academic priority and cutting it would have saved $1.1 million over 10 years.

The board's decision is directly in conflict with the senate and some members of the administration. Western President George Pedersen had campaigned long and hard to close the journalism school.

In a press release Oct. 29 after the decision was announced, Pedersen said he would respect the board's decision but "it is as chair of the senate, however, that I am concerned about the implications of differing judgements of the two governing bodies of this institution. Senate has principle responsibility in the academic sphere and some reconciliation of these differences will have to be achieved."

Desbarats said it "took a lot of courage from members of the board to vote against the senate."

About Pedersen, Desbarats said, "He placed his record on the line and obviously failed."

Jeremy Barker, a writer for the university's daily student newspaper The Gazette, was present at the vote taken by the board.

After the original decision to close the school by the senate, Barker described this vote as anti-climactic.

"There was a lot of talking and reasoning, no shouting. They did two counts and people started cheering once it was clear the vote had passed."

The euphoria was also felt by the journalism school's students. Barker said the journalism students were "ecstatic. Once they found out about the verdict, they opened six bottles of champagne. It was a big celebration."

The school may now proceed with screening applicants for the 1994-95 academic year. Desbarats said even though the school was scheduled to close, it has received 130 paid applications from people "just to get in line for the chance to be considered."

The board's decision also puts an end to any speculation that Carleton's journalism school would absorb or be amalgamated with any part of the Western program.

Carleton and Western's administrations have been formulating plans to amalgamate the programs since the proposed closure in April.

Peter Johansen, the director of the Carleton school of journalism, said he has mixed emotions about the verdict.

"I am delighted to see journalism has not been seen as a discipline which is on the margins of the University of Western Ontario. On the other hand, I think the benefits that could have accrued in journalism education generally, through the development of our own school towards PhD studies, is a temporary set-back," he said.

Johansen, who sits on Carleton's senate, called the conflict between the Western board and senate votes "a real crisis arising at that institution" and said he would be "very disappointed in the Carleton university board of governors if it were to overturn the decision about an academic issue." □

Be more civic-minded, Nader urges students

by Sara-Lynne Levine
Charlatan Staff

Urging students to become civic activists, world-renowned consumer advocate Ralph Nader addressed a crowd of over 100 people at the University of Ottawa on Oct. 31.

Nader was one of the speakers in town to celebrate the 15th anniversary of the Ontario Public Interest Research Group at U of O. Nader's appearance was part of a weekend-long conference called "Exploring Alternatives."

Nader has spent the past 20 years as the United States' foremost consumer advocate. He has been responsible for spearheading changes in consumer, environmental and regulatory legislation.

His group of lobbyists, the "Nader Raiders," issued reports in the 1960s condemning government policies and private companies for unsafe practices, mismanagement and poor products.

The lanky, 59-year-old watchdog arrived at Montpetit Hall dressed in a conservative, navy blue suit, burgundy tie and well-worn, sturdy black shoes. His besides getting good grades," he said.

"It is extremely important in whatever you do, to read and think and grow up civic," said Nader. "Otherwise you walk through life with invisible chains, and these chains are corporate chains."

Students should become more knowledgeable about what is going on in the world, said Nader, so they can make a difference.

"It is important to ask yourself: how do you avoid passivity, resignation and fatalism? How do you avoid being part of a huge crowd of people who, when asked what's the difference between ignorance and apathy, respond 'we don't know and we don't care?'" Nader spoke with a sincerity and a manner that was appreciated by the crowd. Spontaneous applause was frequent, as was the nodding of heads to show agreement. He received a standing ovation when he was finished.

Nader was invited to the conference by OPIRG because of his great influence on public interest groups in the U.S. and Canada, said Len Bush, a co-ordinator at the first OPIRG to form at Waterloo University.

To illustrate how effective student activism can be today, Nader cited the example of Brown University in the United States, where the school has developed a sophisticated, campus-based environmental program encompassing recycling and conservation.

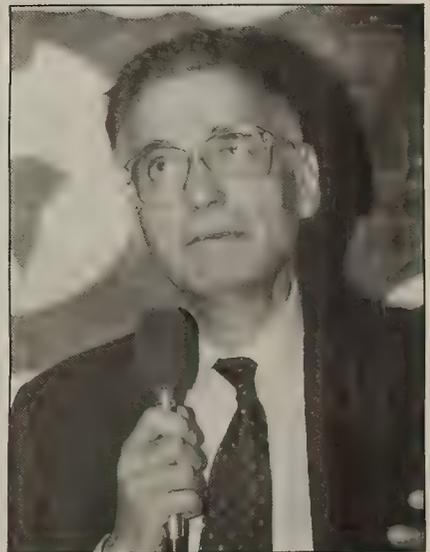

"You must believe how much waste there is on campus in terms of paper, in terms of lighting, in terms of heating, in terms of air conditioning," he said. "You hear schools say they have to raise tuition and close libraries and impose more fees on you, and they are heating the heavens and wasting like crazy."

Nader urged students to do things to change the status quo by taking part in the things that affect them, which he says is important because when students graduate, they will be "leaders from experience."

Nader said students should acquire civic skills such as learning how to develop strategies, how to use the freedom of information act and how to hold effective news conferences.

"The intellectual challenge of civic skill development is unparalleled," said Nader. He said students should have civic skills courses in the schools as part of the curriculum in history, political science, sociology or anthropology.

Nader suggested setting up a curriculum reform committee to ensure they leave something behind to the students

Ralph Nader: lookin' good for an old radical.

"How do you avoid being part of a huge crowd of people who, when asked what's the difference between ignorance and apathy, respond 'we don't know and we don't care?'"

— Ralph Nader

close-cropped, salt-and-pepper hair was windblown and turning white at the temples. Like his shoes, Nader looked trustworthy and dependable.

Nader said he wants to see university students getting involved in the political process. "There is a lot to do at university

OPIRG-Carleton.

"There's a close tie between the PIRGs and Nader," said Bush.

He said Nader practically founded the PIRG movement by organizing advocacy groups as a student and speaking at universities in Canada, which inspired coming after them.

Bush said he liked the speech and that Nader has an important message for students.

"Nader's always advocated notions of personal empowerment and notions of political involvement," he said.

If students do become more civic-minded, said Nader, things may become better in the future despite the world's problems.

"Looking forward to the next 50 years, in addition to the problems of mass poverty, potential war, environmental degradation, disease and artificial intelligence, there are a lot of promising things to look forward to." □

Queen's votes to join new student lobby group

by Jeff Gray
The Queen's Journal, Queen's University

KINGSTON — Queen's students will be paying their dues in the Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance next year and the president of the Queen's undergraduate student council is breathing easy.

Queen's students passed a 95-cent student levy to fund OUSA in a referendum Oct. 13 and 14 by a margin of 273 votes. About one quarter of eligible voters turned out, casting 2,799 votes.

"I'm so thrilled that OUSA passed," said Alma Mater Society President Katherine Phillips.

OUSA is a two-year-old student lobby group whose members include some groups of students at six universities: Queen's, the University of Toronto, Brock University, the University of Western Ontario, Waterloo University and Wilfrid Laurier University.

Queen's students were the first to vote for membership in the organization. Not all of the students who are members have voted to do so. Brock students voted to join OUSA in a referendum on Oct. 21, but not to increase student fees to pay for membership. The other universities' memberships are all based on decisions made by their student councils.

"I really didn't know what to expect," said Phillips of the vote at Queen's. "The issue ended up being about membership and not about (OUSA's) policy."

Phillips said she thought there was "no comprehensive discussion" about OUSA on campus and blamed this on "a lot of misinformation" that she said was circulating during the campaign.

"The key thing is that now we have the money and we will be able to be effective," she said.

The levy, which she said will amount to about $10,200 from Queen's undergraduates, will be used to set up an administrative structure for OUSA, with one or two permanent staff members and an office in Toronto.

OUSA's first statement of policy, which came out when it was formed by student councilors from different universities, was a document called Students for Change. The document called for tuition hikes to help solve underfunding at universities, as long they were accompanied with student loan reform.

OUSA advocates an income-contingent loan repayment plan, whereby students would repay loans as a percentage of their income after graduation. As well, OUSA called for greater contributions from both government and corporate coffers.

A new report is due to be released this week, said Phillips. Part of the document will be a response to the Council of Ontario Universities' proposal to increase tuition up to 50 per cent over two years. But she said it will also present proposals which deal with accountability, accessibility, student aid reform and discretionary fees charged by universities.

The report will tell the provincial government that "our student aid is not adequate to allow for substantial tuition increases," Phillips said.

She also said she hopes "there will be more discussion about the policies that OUSA is advocating, and more student input — because OUSA is supposed to be a flexible organization that responds to the current needs of students." □

Niccoló Machiavelli's advice on getting and keeping power

by Blayne Haggart
Charlatan Staff

The Prince, Niccoló Machiavelli's 16th-century work on the amoral nature of power and how to acquire it, has inspired generations of aspiring leaders, dictators and businessmen.

Its basic thesis, that anything goes as far as getting and maintaining power is concerned, is of obvious interest to power-mad fascists everywhere.

With this thought in mind, we wondered if old

Nick had any advice he'd like to share with Mr. Chrétien, our fearless leader, as he forms his cabinet, which is sworn in Nov. 4. So we drew up a number of questions we're sure leader-for-the-next-five-years-until-he-screws-up-really-badly Chrétien would like to ask.

Machiavelli's answers (taken from Harvey C. Mansfield Jr.'s 1985 translation, available at the University Bookstore) were illuminating, to say the least.

Q: So the Bloc Québécois swept Quebec. Since our party was embarrassed there, can't I just send in the army and subdue the seditious weasels?

Niccoló Machiavelli: Even though one may have the strongest of armies, he always needs the support of the inhabitants of a province in order to enter it. (p. 8)

Q: Then how exactly did the Tories sweep Quebec in 1984?

NM: . . . you can easily enter there, having won over to yourself some baron of the kingdom; for malcontents and those who desire to innovate are always to be found. (p. 18)

Q: I want to slash the army some more. After all, the Americans will protect us.

NM: A wise prince . . . has always avoided (auxiliary) arms and turned to his own. (p. 55)

The Prince himself.

Q: I'm a left-leaning liberal and believe in our sacred, if expensive, social programs. Is this a problem?

NM: . . . there is nothing that consumes itself as much as liberality; while you use it, you lose the capacity to use it; and you become either poor and contemptible or, to escape poverty, rapacious and hateful. Among all the things that a prince should guard against is being contemptible and hated, and liberality leads to both. (pp. 64-65)

Q: I want to raise taxes. What do you think?

NM: This will begin to make (you) hated by (your) subjects. (p. 63)

Q: What did you think of those underhanded, innuendo-filled sleazy Tory campaign ads?

NM: A prince who wants to maintain his state is often forced not to be good. (p. 77)

Q: I just want to be loved. Is that so wrong?

NM: It is much safer to be feared than loved. (p. 66)

Q: Should I keep my promises?
NM: A prudent lord . . . cannot observe faith, nor should he, when such observance turns against him, and the causes that made him promise have been eliminated. (p. 69) □

But you are wanted at The Charlatan!
Come see what we mean, Room 531
Unicentre. (with apologies to Horace)

Today, cuts to OHIP, tomorrow..?

Every year, the cost of getting a university education gets higher and higher, but proposed increases for the future are more daunting than ever.

The Council of Ontario Universities earlier this year proposed to increase tuition by as much as 30 per cent over two years for undergraduate students. The provincial NDP government will soon announce if the increase will take place and by how much.

But the latest symptom of the disease that's eating away at our access to education is the Ontario NDP government's plan to stop paying for health care for the province's 167,000 temporary residents, including about 20,000 international students.

This will add even more to the cost of education for international students by making them pay for private health insurance. By raising the costs of health care, the government is raising barriers to education as well.

This cheap-shot plan is not worth the paper it was written on. The NDP government announced the cuts to the Ontario Health Insurance Plan in April as part of its deficit reduction scheme. The cuts should save the deficit-ridden province about $50 million a year by not covering health care for all temporary residents.

But cutting health care for temporary residents means universal health care, once a pillar of the Canadian identity, may no longer apply in Ontario.

It means international students in the province will have to fork over $300 to $1,000 for private insurance to cover check-ups and hospital stays if they get sick or get into an accident.

It means there will be no more free tests and follow-up treatment for tuberculosis in Carleton's International Students' Centre for people who come from countries where the disease may be more prevalent than in Canada.

It means some international students will go without any health coverage at all. After all, international students already pay tuition between $7,000 and $11,000. On top of living expenses, they have to pay for visa renewals and work permits. God forbid if they want to go home for the summer — a plane ticket overseas can cost around $2,000.

Emechete Onuoha, chair of the Canadian Federation of Students -Ontario, was right when he said the cuts to OHIP represent "a systemic financial attack on international students."

Gladly, though, he says he's going to do something about it. He's going to talk to David Cooke, the Ontario minister of education. He's going to talk to Ruth Grier, the Ontario minister of health.

There's also a petition and a letter opposing the planned cuts that Carleton will send to the government in the hope that it cancels the plan.

The government is being lobbied now, because the plan hasn't come before the NDP caucus members yet. They are the ones who will either swing the axe or put it aside. So, there's still a chance to stop this plan from happening.

All students, not just international students, should be worried about these cuts.

If students can't unite on the most basic thing we have in common — that a lot of us are poor, living on OSAP or just scraping by — what can we unite about?

Go to the International Students' Centre. For God's sake, it's just up the stairs from Mr. Sub in the Unicentre. Sign the petition. Find out what the cuts are all about and how they're going to hurt international students. Talk to Ehab Shanti, the centre's co-ordinator. Call the Ministry of Health. Bark in someone's ear.

This plan is just a symptom of the big disease that is eating up budgets to satisfy the deficit, harming universal access to education. By putting students low on their list of spending priorities, the NDP seems to be saying only rich kids should go to school.

If we don't fight to stop this plan in Ontario, just wait to see what other cuts and fee increases come down the provincial pipe. Thirty-per-cent tuition increases could be coming our way.

WHAT HAD STARTED OUT AS A NORMAL DAY, SUDDENLY TOOK A TURN FOR THE WORSE. ONLY ONE QUESTION REMAINED—WHERE WAS RENÉ?

OPINION

Our future: just us and algae

by Trina Poots
Charlatan staff

Man is more powerful than he is intelligent; and he interprets self-interest as something entailing short-term advantage rather than long-term survival. — Isaac Asimov, science fiction writer and essayist, 1972.

In the past hundred years there have been a countless number of medical and technological breakthroughs that have supposedly improved life. We have drugs that can do things like alleviate a headache or slow the spread of cancer and technology like cars and computers that are supposed to make our lives easier.

My question is, are these breakthroughs really improvements or are they actually setbacks? I don't think these "advances" are as wonderful as they appear to be. Although they have both a positive and negative impact on the individual, they are a threat to humankind overall.

Automobiles are an obvious example of how technology has both adverse and favorable effects on individuals. In 1989, there were 1,286 traffic fatalities in Ontario. A hundred and fifty years ago, cars didn't exist so no one had to remember to buckle up for safety.

In spite of the fact that thousands of people die each year in traffic accidents, cars do have their advantages. A car will get you where you want to go in a fraction of the time it takes to walk.

Of course, cars burn gasoline which releases pollution into the air. Exhaust emissions are carcinogenic and destroy the ozone layer.

There is the argument that some of these advances help us live longer, more comfortable lives. We have chemotherapy to help fight leukaemia, central heating to keep us warm and X-rays to discover injury and illness. But, as with automobiles, there are trade offs. You may get nauseated from the chemo, sick building syndrome from poor ventilation and radiation from the X-rays.

Despite the trade offs, these and other advances have made life longer for the individual. In 1950, the average lifespan of any person in the world was 46 years; in 1990, that increased to 63 years. Every year, the average lifespan grows by about 2.4 years.

But, as the length of time each individual spends on the planet increases, so does the world's population. In 1950, the number of people on the planet was about 2.5 billion. In 1985, it was almost double that at 4.8 billion. If the current growth rate continues there will be over 8 billion people on the earth in 2020.

This rapid population growth is what makes me question the value of technology and medicine. As the world's population grows, so does the area that we occupy. As cities expand, forests and lakes get destroyed — if acid rain doesn't get to them first.

We can't take up every square kilometre of land on the planet. We need trees to produce oxygen and land to grow food. Not to mention that it would be nice to leave some room for wildlife.

In his 1972 essay, "Man, the Overbalancer," Isaac Asimov said unless something is done to slow or maintain population growth, in 400 years the planet will have a denser human population than Manhattan Island.

Because there will no space available for anything besides people, the planet will only be capable of supporting one type of plant life: algae, which will be breakfast, lunch and supper. If population growth continues people will die from starvation and malnutrition. What little food there is available will cause world-wide tension and violence.

So, do the benefits of technology and medicine to the individual outweigh the costs to humankind? If something isn't done to control population growth, then no, the costs to humankind are too great.

There are no simple solutions to the problem, but technology and medicine could be used effectively to help find answers.

For example, palliative care is a branch of a medicine that focuses on letting a terminally ill person choose to die comfortably instead of trying to make them live as long as possible.

I'm not saying that everyone should give up all modern cures and luxuries. These breakthroughs are only part of the reason our population is growing so rapidly. But, the problem of population growth should be considered when we decide what kinds of technological and medical research to pursue.

Instead of being concerned with making life longer for the individual, we have to think about making life longer for humankind.

Keep women in CUSA positions

Editor:
 Re: CUSA to hire a new safety commissioner, The Charlatan, Oct. 21, 1993.

It stated in your article that Lucy Watson has, since May, been responsible for the duties of safety commissioner. I'd like to ask where this information came from.

Brenda Kennedy, the Foot Patrol coordinator, from my understanding, was given the duties of safety commissioner in May until it was decided if and when a new commissioner would be hired.

She fulfilled these duties by dealing with Carleton's department of safety and public relations, sitting on required committees and putting up safety posters around campus.

While CUSA council meetings stated inconclusively the hiring of a new commissioner, (Watson "yes," Faucher, "not sure") throughout the summer, Brenda Kennedy continued these additional duties (for no additional pay).

I think The Charlatan overlooked this woman's dedication, effort and advocacy for a safe campus.

I'd also like to raise the issue of hiring policies at CUSA. It was falsely believed by myself and others that the position of safety commissioner was an affirmative action position.

Considering the momentous impact that campus safety has on women at Carleton, why would CUSA neglect to incorporate a way of ensuring that a woman (preferably a woman who falls under affirmative action herself, i.e. of color, lesbian, disabled), is safety commissioner? The same arguments can be used for the position of Foot Patrol coordinator. This position was also believed, even by Brenda Kennedy herself, that it was under affirmative action. All Foot Patrol co-ordinators and safety commissioners have been women, (though white, straight and abled), so far. Let's ensure that women stay in these positions. An affirmative action policy would allow for all women to have an opportunity at these positions.

Extra weight isn't why rowers lost

Editor:
 Re: "Overweight rowers weigh team down," The Charlatan, Oct. 28, 1993.

The last-place finish of the women's novice eight crew at the McGill Invitational Regatta was by far and away a consequence of their combined team performance and the type of boat used and not, as the article incorrectly suggested, due to their coxswain weighing over 110 pounds. It is hoped that future articles on rowing will be written with more accuracy and sensitivity.

Courses have non-Western content

Editor:
 Re: "Curriculum helps perpetuate racism," The Charlatan, Oct. 28, 1993.

That article highlights comments by CUSA representative Gary Anandasangaree which criticize the curriculum of the political science department for supposedly ignoring non-European or non-North American perspectives on the basis of the fact that one of our courses in political theory focuses on Western political thought.

The department of political science offers the following courses that fall primarily into the non-European, non-North American category:

- 47.310 Government and Politics in Africa
- 47.311 Government and Politics of Latin America
- 47.312 Government and Politics of East Asia
- 47.315 Government and Politics of South and South-East Asia
- 47.323 Government and Politics in the Middle East
- 47.332* East Asian Political Thought (China, Japan, Korea)
- 47.345* Comparative Public Policy Analysis
- 47.352* Women in Politics: Third World
- 47.414* Theory and Practice in Third World Development
- 47.415* Selected Problems in Third World Development
- 47.423* The Politics of Southern Africa
- 47.440* Comparative Public Administration
- 47.482* International Politics of Africa
- 47.483* Foreign Policies of Major East

- Asian Powers
- 47.484* International Relations of South and Southeast Asia
- 47.517* Selected Problems in African Politics
- 47.518* State, Revolution and Reform in East Asia
- 47.519* Comparative Public Policy
- 47.522* Politics of Third World Development
- 47.523* The Politics of Southern Africa
- 47.545* Public Administration in Developing Countries
- 47.581* Foreign Policies of African States

A number of first- and second-year courses also deal in part with other areas of the world. In addition, our MA and PhD programs allow specialization in other areas of the world.

I find it deplorable that charges of racism or ethnocentrism are thrown around without those responsible for making them providing systematic evidence and without your reporter bothering to contact the victims of such vicious remarks. They have only themselves to blame if people don't take them very seriously in future.

ADVISING

Both Registrarial Services Offices (RSO) provide advising services regarding your academic program and the regulations and policies of the Faculties of Arts and Social Sciences, which includes the handling of petitions for special consideration. If you require advice on aspects of your major program of study, you should consult your major department(s). If you have a question but aren't certain where to address it, either RSO can act as a clearinghouse for information.

RECORDS

Each RSO processes applications for such things as declaration and change of major, letters of permission (studying elsewhere as a Carleton student), deferred, supplemental and grade-raising exams, review of final grade, and graduation. Each office is also responsible for assessing students' academic standing, explaining academic audits, and responding to registration problems. We also maintain your address record. If you move or change telephone numbers, please notify us as soon as possible.

Final examinations in fall term courses and mid-term examinations in fall/winter courses may be scheduled as announced.

THE LAST WORD

Don't forget that your Christmas examination results will have a direct impact on your end-of-session evaluation. This evaluation (called academic standing decision) governs whether you can return to studies the following year. If you do well, there should be no problem. If you don't do well, perhaps we should talk about it after the results are in.

Best of luck in your studies.

 Carleton UNIVERSITY

Cuba is a fascinating and complicated country.

Since my return from a three-month exchange with the University of Havana this past July, I have spent many moments digesting thoughts on my time in Cuba.

Latin, Caribbean and African cultures are fused together on this crowded island of 10 million people, where Fidel Castro's socialist politics have governed the country for the last 34 years. Cubans continually feel the immense negative economic pressure from the United States' trade embargo, designed to cause Castro to step down. The influence of capitalism in the United States, not 100 kilometres away from the island, has been intensifying in the last five years. Coupled with the fall of communism in Eastern Europe, Cuba is in a state of uncertain change.

Despite Cuba's current economic and political crisis, academic institutions such as the University of Havana maintain intellectual ties all over the world.

Carleton International started an official exchange program with the University of Havana last year largely due to the work of my supervisors, professors Margaret McCully and Martin Canny of Carleton's biology department, who recognized the potential for collaborations in plant research with the faculty of biology at the University of Havana.

SCIENCE AND AGRICULTURE

As a master's student in biology, I study plant roots and the way they interact with soil, water and micro-organisms.

During the exchange I had the opportunity to work amongst Cuban scientists who have been studying special bacteria found on corn roots and in sugar-cane, which have been shown to actually improve the growth of these plants.

I worked in the microbiology department and plant physiology laboratory at the University of Havana. Despite their extreme shortages of scientific resources and such basic things as running water, electricity, and gas, Cuban students and professors gave me a lot of help and often suggested practical alternatives to scientific procedures.

I was immediately struck by their ability to work with very little equipment and produce scientific work which is competitive world-wide.

I also saw advanced levels of science at the Cuban National Institute of Science and the Biotechnology Institute. I had first-hand experience with Cuban agriculture when I went for two weeks with 300 students and faculty of the biology department on agricultural duty, Although this is a volunteer experience often enjoyed by many, the students in the faculty of biology were told they would not graduate if they failed to participate.

Agricultural duty is Cuba's policy of ensuring that each and every Cuban contributes the production of the nation's food and, in the process, is aware of the kind of labor involved in agriculture. Cubans leave their regular jobs for a total of four weeks out of the year and go to field stations where they tend to crops. After working for two weeks at a field station planting and harvesting crops, I realized that Fidel Castro's idea of economic prosperity coming through advanced science and tech-crops to plant.

The Soviet Union may have given Cuba much aid, but it seems to have been accompanied by bad agricultural advice.

It is difficult to understand why a subtropical country that should be growing a wide range of fruits and vegetables all year round only offers such things as cabbage, beet roots, carrots and sweet potatoes to the people.

EL PERIODO ESPECIAL

The Soviet Union withdrew all its aid to Cuba in the late 1980s, which amounted to about $4 billion per year. It also stopped selling Cuba oil at reduced prices and buying Cuban sugar at elevated prices.

Since then Cuba has increasingly felt the effects of the strict trade embargo that the United States began 31 years ago, three years after the revolution in 1959 led by Fidel Castro. This embargo was tightened in 1992 to prevent not only businesses in the States from trading with Cuba, but also their subsidiaries outside the United States. To add to Cuba's economic woes, a severe hurricane this past March damaged important sugar-cane crops and caused about $100 million in damage. In an attempt to preserve its limited resources and faced with no other option, the government was forced in 1990 to implement a program called El Periodo Especial, or the Special Period.

There is nothing special about El Periodo Especial.

There are food shortages, and people receive through la libreta (a ration book) limited amounts of rice, black beans, vegetables such as cabbage and beet root (occasionally potatoes and carrots), almost no meat, occasionally eggs, and only sometimes fruit, such as oranges and plantains, at their local distribution stands. Everyone gets one piece of bread per day, which has to be picked up daily. There is very little fossil fuel and thus there is almost no public transportation. Those buses still running in Havana arrive three to four hours late, so crowded that people are falling from the doors.

People with cars very rarely receive gasoline any more. When I left, 20 litres a month was the infrequently received ration. Fortunately, Fidel Castro received 1 million bikes from China in the late 1980s and started a bicycle riding campaign. Most people will say they enjoy the bicycle as a mode of transport, but in hot weather, with far to go and not enough to eat, people naturally complain.

The shortage of fossil fuel also means little electrical power. Depending on the region of the country, people face 10 to 16 hours of blackout daily. Electrinology has not played a positive role in providing immediate basic needs, such as food, for the people.

Unfortunately, technologically advanced agricultural methods are used where they are not needed. Instead of planting in fertile Cuban soil, we planted in cement banks filled with special rocks and sprayed with expensive, electrically pumped, nutrient solution. The process was costly and inefficient. Plus, the produce all went to tourism and would never reach areas where students and faculty received their food. Cuba, at one point in the mid 1980s, had the highest number of tractors per capita in the world. These tractors can be seen today sitting unused due to lack of fuel, broken parts or lack of cal plants are breaking down and there are few machinery parts for repair. Material things such as clothing are non-existent in Cuban stores. Medicine is also becoming scarce and a doctor friend told me that hospitals are running out of essential supplies such as anesthetic.

I found everyone, students and employees alike, discussing El Periodo Especial all the time. People continually talk about food, where they get it, when they will receive it, cook it, eat it.

Transportation and blackouts are also a continual source of conversation.

People are so consumed by their daily survival that they spend less and less time doing their jobs or studying. This problem has recently intensified since government-run cafeterias in the schools and workplaces were closed down this past September and people now take additional travel time out of their day to go home for lunch.

Physically, people have very little time and energy to try to change things constructively. Notably, some people in Havana, those with small yards or patios, have tried to grow food and raise such animals as chickens and even pigs. But seeds are difficult to get, feed for the animals is expensive and leftover meal scraps are scarcer and scarcer.

The government has offered people the opportunity to use any vacant land in the outskirts of the city to grow things for personal consumption but, again, where does one get the seeds, equipment and the expertise to farm the land?

THE CHANGING ECONOMY

In an attempt to restore basic things like fuel, electricity, food and medical supplies the Cuban government is trying, ironically, to get American dollars to use on the foreign market.

Any foreign investor is welcomed by the Cuban government to put up to 50 per cent of the capital involved in any business venture in Cuba. Joint ventures in tourism with Spain, Mexico, to some extent Canada, and now Colombia, Venezuela and Panama are slowly bringing in some money. There are also promising foreign investments in offshore oil drilling, nickel mining and tropical fruit growth.

The influx of tourism and the American dollar have caused many changes in Cuba. Hotels with large satellite dishes on their rooftops carry American television stations like CNN. The Cuban people have been able to pick up these channels and are exposed to a news source other than the one provided by the government.

Special tourist stores sell such things as Coke, western jeans and Labatt's Blue beer in addition to much sought-after food products, soap, toothpaste and shampoo, all for American dollars. American dollars are very valuable in Cuba because they can buy both basic needs and the latest western fashion. Cubans, especially young people, are not immune to desiring the latest running shoes or trendy T-shirts.

While I was in Cuba, only foreigners and tourists could use American dollars to eat in restaurants and buy things in the special stores that only deal in American currency. This has created a large black market, where products that can only be bought in dollars in these special stores are resold at inflated prices. On the black market a pair of jeans would cost a Cuban professor three months' salary.

Also available on the black market are services and products made by people in their homes. These range from plumbing and hair dressing to the making of sweets and earrings.

In an attempt to inject illegally held American dollars into the official economy, Cubans are now allowed to use this currency in tourist stores and restaurants.

In early September the government legalized the "privatization" of over 100 small businesses and trades, like plumbing, hair dressing, and taxi companies. But the people providing these services are still not legally allowed to be paid in dollars, so they are still operating within the black market.

Only people who do not have a university degree can own a private business. This widens the economic gap between, for example, a university professor and a taxi driver. As a person involved with tourism and dollars, the taxi driver is a rich person in Cuba.

In agriculture, farmers must sell their produce in pesos to the government, who in turn sells to the people. This does not increase productivity if farmers can sell their produce on the black market in dollars.

The government should open up a farmers' market, like one the government shut in the early 1980s because it was thought they were getting too rich, where farmers directly benefit from their labors.

People do not receive enough food from their local government food stands, and the Cuban government cannot expect agricultural duty by the general public to be productive. Although the surroundings of agricultural duty are a break from day-to-day city life, the incentive to work is low, the cost of mobilizing and feeding people while they are not at their regular jobs is too much and does not produce the amount of food required. The social and moral benefits gained from the experience of knowing the labor involved in producing food are good, but are outweighed by present economic need in Cuba.

THE UNCERTAIN FUTURE

For a sheltered Canadian student, the opportunity to experience a place like Cuba was great. Although I encountered a country with many frustrating shortages, I returned to Canada to be repulsed by the excesses we take for granted.

What I saw was a country paralysed by a complicated economic and social situation. The economic problems are brought on by both the trade embargo by the United States and the strict internal control of Cuban markets, such as agriculture, by the Cuban government.

The social environment is a result of 34 years of control of the people. People seem not to know what their alternatives are. If they say they do, they think it is the capitalism of the United States.

Now is the time to preserve all the benefits of the Cuban revolution: widespread education, a high standard of science and technology and universal medical care.

The infrastructure for a First World country exists. Cuba is a country with highly nationalistic people, but they want to enjoy an acceptable standard of living. Hopefully the slow but seemingly progressive changes of the government will mean neither of these aspects have to be compromised in Cuba's future.

Overtime thriller ends in loss

Playoffs over for soccer men

by Sarah Richards
Charlatan Staff

After over two hours of soccer, a solitary player sat on the field, hands on his knees, white towel draped over his head.

Only the white jersey with the black number 10 on the back identified him as Raven forward Basil Phillips.

Buried under the towel was the disappointment and frustration of Carleton's 1-0 overtime playoff loss against the fourth-place Queen's Golden Gaels.

Queen's 1 Carleton 0

The Oct. 30 loss on penalty kicks ended any dream the first-place Ravens had of advancing to the provincial finals and possibly the nationals.

"I think I felt worse today than when I was playing, because it's out of your control. It's frustrating to lose in penalty kicks," said assistant coach David McFall. He played last year when the Ravens lost 2-1 to Laurentian in the league finals.

The Ravens played a near-faultless 90 minutes against Queen's, pressuring the Gaels' defence the entire game. The ball seldom crossed into the Ravens' half, and when it did, Carleton's defence was there to send it upfield. Queen's goalie Liam Stevenson said it was the most intense game he had ever played.

"It makes it very hard to defend against them because the defence just pumps it back up so you're constantly under pressure just being bombarded by balls all the time," said rookie Stevenson.

Had it not been for the many saves made by Stevenson, Carleton would be probably heading to the league finals.

On numerous occasions the Ravens were presented with an opportunity to score, but the decisive goal eluded them. Raven fullback Earl Cochrane said the team's failure to score was not the fault of any particular forward.

"The way we play, there's no one person you should be saying, 'Oh, you should be scoring our goals.' We end up putting five or six guys in the box; probably half of them aren't even attackers."

The Ravens dominated the Gaels during the regular and overtime periods.

The referee's decision to disallow two goals added salt to the Raven loss.

A throng of players in front of the Queen's net let Carleton tap the ball in during the second half. The referee, who was out of position to judge if the ball had crossed the goal line, disallowed it.

"The ball did go over the line. We scored. We were all cheering... then ol' gutless didn't call it," said fullback Andre van Heerden. "I think we were robbed." The second disallowed goal came in the shootout, which capped a 20-minute scoreless overtime period.

Fullback Marty Lauter was the second Raven to face Queen's goalkeeper Stevenson. Lauter's shot cuffed the bottom of the crossbar and deflected directly down to the ground.

"First of all the referee said it was in... so of course everybody celebrated, and then all of the sudden the linesman shook his head," said Lauter.

After four penalty shots apiece, both teams had scored two goals.

On the Ravens' fifth shot, Chris Scucatto missed. Golden Gael's Rich Price didn't.

Price drove a low ball into the right side of the net, scoring the 3-2 tie-breaking goal for an ecstatic Queen's team.

The Ravens stood numb on the field.

"I guess if you believe in fate a little bit... it wasn't meant to be," said Raven keeper Stevie Ball afterwards. "If you have a game like that, maybe 80 or 90 per cent you win those games that you dominate... then it really sucks the 10 per cent when you don't." □

Overtime shootout: shot by shot

1 — Carleton stopper Earl Cochrane does his traditional galloping stride approach to shoot a waist-high ball to the right. The shot is blocked in a spectacular dive by Queen's goalkeeper Liam Stevenson.

Pedro prays for Panda

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

Dear Carleton Athletics, It's me again.

You know — the Panda your football team hasn't won since way back in 1987.

And I'm writing because I've heard a scary, scary, scary rumor.

I understand Carol Turgeon, the University of Ottawa athletic director, doesn't want to hold the annual Lansdowne Park Panda Game any more because attendance is down and the universities loses money.

A peak crowd of over 17,000 six years ago dwindled to just 3,500 this year.

Profits are non-existent and both universities have turned accumulated losses of $50,000 apiece since 1987. Neither school is expecting to make money this year either.

Bummer.

Now as you know, I'm just a small stuffed bear. I don't know much about politics, money, sex — or even football.

But I do know that the Panda Game in my honor — a tradition between the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees and Carleton Ravens football teams for 39 years — is the university sporting event of the year in this city.

No ifs, ands or buts about it.

Now we both know students can be apathetic little weenies and that money's tight all around. But surely there's an alternative solution to scrapping the game.

And because I'm such a bright little guy with plenty of time on my hands, I've come up with the following four-point Panda proposal to raise attendance, make money and keep the tradition alive:

1 — Lower the ticket prices. Eight dollars for a student ticket is outrageous. No wonder attendance is down. If you're going to charge an exorbitant sum like that, you'd damn well better be able to provide an entertaining event worthy of the price.

2 — Eliminate the attendance limit. Ever since a 1987 accident when a railing broke under the weight of spectators and injured 14 students, an attendance limit of 10,000 has been in effect to keep the crowds under control. That hardly seems necessary any more.

3 — Another financial drain resulting from the 1987 accident was the necessity of having a security force on hand to keep the rabble under control. Last year's security cost the schools about $32,000. Figures aren't in for how much this year's three-tiered force of 50 Ottawa police, 80 stadium and 220 student security guards cost the schools. But you can bet your bamboo shoots it didn't cost any less. Certainly security is needed, but that many?

4 — Move the Panda Game to an earlier date. The end of orientation week would be the ideal weekend to host the game. Just think of it — a new hoard of enthusiastic students with money to burn at a football game.

Now I know I'm just a silly little stuffed bear who's not very bright and whose opinion doesn't really count for much in the big scheme of things, but I think these are reasonable suggestions to keep my game alive.

Sincerely,
Pedro the Panda

Raven football season of improvement

by Derek DeCloet and Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

What a difference a year makes. Years of frustration, pain and agony were wiped away this year as the Ravens football team posted its best record in six years.

Sure, the 2-5 Ravens ended the season on a sour note, losing their last four games including the playoff-determining Panda Game — but that still doesn't diminish what this team accomplished.

In fact, the Ravens — who were 0-7 a year ago — were probably the most improved team in the Ontario-Quebec Interuniversity Football Conference.

Was the Ravens' season a success? You bet. Here's the evidence:

Ravens review: game by game

SEPT. 11: McGill 22 Carleton 17

You can't win if you're always giving the ball to the other team. That's what the Ravens did, committing seven turnovers. Still, the Ravens were persistent in this one — coming back, nearly all the way back, from a 22-3 third-quarter deficit.

SEPT. 18: Carleton 19 Ottawa 18

The win that really wasn't. Ottawa scored a touchdown to tie the game in the dying minutes, then kicked the convert to go ahead — or so they thought. Line judge John Lamont ruled it was wide and the Ravens later won it on a single by kicker Chris Giacobbi. It was a controversial win, but hey, a win's a win.

SEPT. 25: Carleton 25 Queen's 20

Knocking off the '92 Vanier Cup champs was the high point of the season for Carleton. Trailing 17-3 at halftime, quarterback Shawn Thompson came off the bench to lead the Ravens' comeback. The real story, though, was running back Dave Bosveld — three touchdowns and 145 yards rushing.

OCT. 2: Bishop's 34 Carleton 1

This was a reality check for the euphoric Ravens as they were humbled by the first-place Gaiters at Raven Field. Quarterbacks Sean O'Neill and Thompson combined for five interceptions and the Ravens were never in it. "This was a wake-up call," said Smith after the game.

OCT. 9: Queen's 26 Carleton 8

Smith's wake-up call went unheeded as the Golden Gaels exacted revenge. The play that told the story: Queen's receiver Paul Kozan caught a long pass downfield from quarterback Steve Othen and was immediately surrounded by several Raven tacklers. They missed him and Kozan's subsequent touchdown gave the Gaels a 19-1 lead.

OCT. 16: Concordia 25 Carleton 21

Perhaps the most heartbreaking loss of the season. Carleton had a 21-6 lead in the third quarter and let it slip away. Hanging on to a three-point lead with two minutes left, Raven Wayne Wilson fumbled a missed field goal attempt in the end zone. Concordia recovered for the winning touchdown.

OCT. 24: Ottawa 21 Carleton 3

The Gee-Gees scored three touchdowns in less than six minutes in the fourth quarter to recapture Pedro for the sixth year in a row. A win would have put Carleton in the O-QIFC playoffs. Instead, we got to share the pain and reflect on a season of might-have-beens. □

Carleton more than doubled their 1992 offensive output of 44 points, scoring 94.

The defence trimmed last year's points-against total of 237 by 71, bringing it to a more respectable 166 allowed.

Kicker Chris Giacobbi led the team in scoring last year with 16 points. This year a trio including Giacobbi, running backs Chris Dorrington and Dave Bosveld all scored 18 apiece.

Bosveld also managed to place second in O-QIFC, rushing with 270 yards on 62 carries despite only playing in four games.

Other offensive leaders included Wayne Wilson, who led all kick off returners in the league with 12 returns for 212 yards and defensive back Jason Mallet who was second in O-QIFC interceptions with four.

Defensively, tackle Harry Van Hofwegen's seven quarterback sacks were also good enough for second in the league.

Certainly much credit should go to coach Donn Smith, who was a strong contender for O-QIFC Coach of the Year honors, as well as the support staff he recruited.

Topping it all off, two Ravens were named to the 1993 O-QIFC all-star team — offensive tackle Steve Szumlinski and Van Hofwegen.

The Ravens didn't have a perfect season. At times, they didn't even a pretty season. But they did provide fans with some long-awaited happy highlights and hope for future success. □

Rowing club places six crews in finals

by Steven Vesely
Charlatan Staff

The Carleton varsity rowing club produced its best ever results at the combined men's and women's rowing championships on Oct. 30 at the Henley Course in St. Catharines, Ont.

With entries in six rowing categories, Carleton placed crews in the finals of every event they entered. Last year, only sculler Elizabeth Kuran made the finals, placing third in the single sculls race.

This year was a different story. "We had so many entries in the championship categories," said club president David Lewis. "It's a sign of our success. The people who are now involved are really making it happen. Their dedication and commitment have allowed us to have such a strong and competitive season."

Topping the list of results was the men's lightweight double crew of Rob Bennett and Trevor MacKay, who finished second in the final behind the University of Western crew.

"They're both very, very good scullers and they came together really well," said men's coach Byron Johnson. "I wouldn't have been surprised if they had won it. They're first-rate rowers at a university level."

MacKay and Bennett followed up the lightweight double's second-place result with individual honors as well. MacKay placed third in the men's heavyweight single while Bennett finished fourth in the men's lightweight single.

Trevor MacKay and Rob Bennett led Carleton at the OUAA/OWIAA finals.

The men's heavyweight fours finished sixth in their final, beating out the University of Ottawa.

"That was disappointing," said Johnson. "They had a much better race last week against McGill. We were expecting to challenge for first or second but it just didn't happen. They got off to a bad start."

In the women's races, both the lightweight fours and the heavyweight fours finished sixth in their respective finals.

"I think the results are quite good considering it's such a young program," said women's coach John Ossowski. "You've got to remember they were rowing against some pretty stiff competition. Some of those students out there are national team members. It's not like they were rowing somewhere in the Prairies."

In overall team standings among the nine universities competing, the men's crew placed seventh with a team total of 21 points. The women's crews placed eighth with eight points. Western crews dominated, winning both the men's and women's team standings with 109 and 80 points respectively.

"All things considered as a club we did as well as we could have. Six weeks is not a lot of time together and we did all right," said lightweight women's four member Nicole Lebon. □

Playoff loss ends impressive rugby men's season

Ravens move up to first division

by Matt Shurrie

It's tough being a cub playing against a fully grown lion.

And when the Carleton Ravens rugby team stormed into Kingston to face the Queen's Golden Gaels on Oct. 30 — a cub is exactly what they were as the less experienced Ravens lost 28-3 to the stronger Gaels team.

Queen's 28 Carleton 3

The Ravens are the second-division champions in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association, while the Gaels are the first-division champions.

"Our guys played well against them," said Carleton coach Lee Powell. "But I think they (Queen's) play a high-level game on a regular basis so their level of play was just a touch higher than ours. We have the same skills and ability, but you don't see it on a regular basis."

The OUAA rugby league is divided into two divisions. The stronger teams play in the first division and the weaker teams play in the second. The playoff format pits the division one champion against the weaker division two champion. The second- and third-place teams in the first division also make the playoffs, facing off against each other.

Being a less experienced, weaker team facing off against a more powerful foe, the Ravens did the best they could but their playoff inexperience couldn't be overcome. The Ravens' last playoff game was in 1987, when they lost 21-6 to the Golden Gaels.

"The game was closer than the score indicates, with the Golden Gaels putting points on the board near the end," said Powell, explaining the lopsided 28-3 score. "The team gave everything they had, but Queen's showed us what an advantage it is to be coming out of the first division."

Despite the trouncing, it can't be forgotten the Ravens had weaker competition in the second division and playing the top team in the league was somewhat of a culture shock for Carleton.

"What needs to be looked at, is the fact that they've proven that they're worthy of the first division next season," said Powell.

This year's team dominated its division two opponents, racking up 170 offensive points while allowing only 43 en route to a 6-1 record.

As a result of their first-place finish in the second division, next year's Ravens will face off against the universities of Queen's, McMaster, Western, Guelph and York in much stiffer competition. □

QUOTE OF THE WEEK

"We're not keeping the official scorer very busy."

Athletic director Keith Harris commenting on the 0-0 tie between the Ravens and the Golden Gaels soccer teams as they prepared for overtime.

BRIEFS

In exhibition fencing, Carleton dominated the second annual Rookie Challenge on Oct. 31 at the Ravens' Nest.

In the men's foil class, Carleton fencer Curtis Lockett placed first, followed by Ravens Chad Ito and Andrew Morrier.

In women's foil, Heather Findlayton and Natalie Remedes finished second and third behind Ottawa's France Daviault.

About 50 rookie Carleton fencers competed against the universities of Ottawa and Queen's.

The Carleton hockey team lost 5-4 to the Potsdam State Bears in exhibition action on Oct. 30 in Potsdam, N.Y.

Trailing 4-2 in the third period, the Carleton club tied the game at four with four minutes left before the Bears squeezed a soft shot through the pads of Carleton goaltender Pat McFetridge. McFetridge was the game star, stopping 35 of 37 shots.

Earlier in the week on Oct. 27, the Carleton club tied the National Defence headquarter team 1-1 in senior R.A. league action. The tie raises the hockey club's record to 0-2-2.

Soccer women shut out in playoff loss

Three Ravens named all-stars

The women's soccer team lost 3-0 to the Sir Wilfrid Laurier Golden Hawks, ending their playoff drive in Windsor on Oct. 29.

Laurier went on to beat the University of Western Ontario Mustangs 2-0 Oct. 30 and the McMaster University Marauders 2-1 Oct. 31 in the Ontario final to repeat as Ontario Women's Interuniversity Athletic Association's provincial champions.

Laurier 3 Carleton 0

"Going in as a fourth-place team, you can't expect to dominate a first-place team," said Raven defender Kathy Keegan, of the 8-0-4 Golden Hawks.

Despite the team being shut out and having scored only four goals in the final four games of the season, Keegan refused to blame her team's offence.

"We're not as technically a good team as they are. Their passing is superior. They're a notch above us in every way," she said.

Nevertheless, the 5-3-2 Ravens were optimistic heading into the match.

"All four (of Laurier's) ties occurred near the end of the season, so we figured they were on a bit of a downside. We thought we'd just go out and give it our best shot," said Keegan.

Their best shot wasn't enough.

Laurier opened the scoring at the 25-minute mark of the first half with a goal which bounced off goaltender Kristina Bacchi's hands and was blown in by a strong wind.

A rocket shot to the left corner gave the Golden Hawks a 2-0 halftime lead.

Another bullet late in the game sealed victory for Laurier.

On a happier note, three Carleton players were named to the east division all-star team at a league banquet on Oct. 28.

Rookie goaltender Bacchi, midfielder Nicole Maynard and Keegan were named to the OWIAA eastern all-star team. It was the first time Carleton had placed three players to the all-star team in the same year.

"It's tremendous," said Kent. "It really shows the improvement of the (soccer) program."

Goalkeeper Kristina Bacchi, defender Kathy Keegan and halfback Nicole Maynard were named to the OWIAA all-star team.

Teamwork.

There's not too much else that seems to work better for the Carleton Ravens men's water polo team.

The Ravens opened the second half of their regular season with an 11-3 pummeling of the Queen's Golden Gaels on Oct. 31, improving their record to an impressive 4-2-1 and keeping them in third place in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association's water polo league.

Carleton 11 Queen's 3

"We just played as a team and that's pretty much it," said driver Stewart Mackie.

Entering the game, the Ravens were determined to avenge a season opening 11-5 loss to Queen's on Oct. 3.

The Ravens had first possession of the ball and quickly scored 30 seconds into the game.

"Their weakness is they don't have strong outside players so we were making their weaker players take the shot," said Carleton holeman Brian Young. "We just kept control and kept to our game."

The Ravens led 8-2 at halftime and 11-2 after three quarters. In the final quarter, the Ravens played some of their second-string players, including back-up goalie Andy Pohl, while cruising to the easy 11-3 victory.

Goal scoring was well-distributed amongst team members. Driver Dave Bason scored three, while Young, Mackie and holecheck Corry Burke each scored twice. Drivers Rob Weber and Jeff McGrath added singles.

In earlier action, the Ravens defeated a Carleton alumni team, including last year's Most Valuable Player Scott Tweedy, 15-14 in overtime. It was the first time in the history of the game that the varsity club had defeated the alumni team.

Bason led the Ravens with seven goals while Burke scored the winner in overtime.

Basketball men drop pair in Ottawa tourney

Reagh Vidito nets all-star selection

by Kevin Restivo

Charlatan Staff

Too many tricks and not enough treats. That sums up the Halloween weekend for the Carleton men's basketball team.

The Ravens dropped two games to the University of Ottawa Gee-Gees and the Guelph Gryphons by the ghoulish scores of 100-82 and 92-66 at the 19th annual University of Ottawa Tip-Off Classic Oct. 29-30.

Ottawa 100 Carleton 82
Guelph 92 Carleton 66

Against Ottawa, Carleton kept the Gee-Gees off balance early with an aggressive trapping defence. In fact, the Ravens even outran the blazing Gee-Gees, capitalizing on many fast-break chances.

But that early tide shifted at the 10-minute mark of the first half when third-year forward Taffe Charles received his third foul of the game. Ravens' head coach Paul Armstrong was forced to pull Charles—the team's best offensive threat.

The score was 21-20 at the time, but without Charles, the Ravens faltered and trailed 51-35 at the half.

Charles wasn't alone in courting foul trouble. The Ravens as a team picked up 23 fouls in the first half alone.

"I don't mind if we pick up fouls, but we simply weren't moving our feet and we ended up picking up some stupid, sloppy fouls," said Armstrong.

Carleton made a number of runs at the Gee-Gees in the second half, but couldn't sustain them as foul trouble continued to take its toll.

Back in the game to start the second half, Charles left the game with his fifth foul with 10 minutes left to play. Freshman forward Brian Russell followed suit two minutes later.

Perhaps the biggest loss of the game occurred with 5:14 left on the clock when second-year forward James Marquardt, the Ravens' leading scorer with 18 points, injured his right knee in a scrum for the ball. He's expected to be out of the lineup for a minimum of two weeks.

The Ravens shot 10 for 24 from the foul line while the Gee-Gees were 29 for 42 — a 19-point difference which was almost exactly the margin of victory for Ottawa.

"We're not a good foul-shooting team this season and it's costing us" said Armstrong. "I'm still impressed with the intensity and enthusiasm that we had to start off but we've got to be a much smarter team and that should come with experience."

The following evening, the Ravens were thoroughly outplayed by the Guelph Gryphons. Guelph stormed out to an early 19-7 lead and never looked back.

Inexperience hurt the Ravens as third-year point guard Luca Diaconescu sat out with a swollen hand and Marquardt did not play because of the injury sustained against Ottawa.

Rookie replacements were exploited by the Gryphons, who took advantage of Carleton's inexperience by throwing a variety of pressure defences at the Ravens, pouncing on any forced free balls.

"We just had no intensity at the start. Our heads weren't into it" said second-year point guard Curtis Houlden.

Despite the losses, Reagh Vidito, a first-year swingman recruit from Prince Edward Island, supplied one huge, bright spark for the Ravens.

Vidito was phenomenal against Guelph, draining seven three-pointers en route to a spot on the tournament all-star team.

"It was really gratifying but it was disappointing that it had to come in the effort that it did," said the humble Vidito.

Carleton faces off against the last year's Canadian Interuniversity Athletic Union national champions, the St. Francis Xavier X-Men, on Nov. 5 at the annual House-Laughton tournament at the Ravens' Nest.

Sailors sail

On a chilly Halloween morning, members of the Carleton sailing club gathered at the Britannia Yacht Club to host a regatta with Queen's University.

Racing 420-class boats in eight races, Queen's posted the top three overall results while the recently formed Carleton crew brought up the rear.

"Queen's has some very experienced sailors," said Carleton sailor Dave Nurse. "They've been racing in hundreds of races. They had quite a good team and they thrashed us thoroughly."

Ian Eckhart, a Queen's sailor and national team member, was skipper of the first-place boat. Queen's skipper Craig Rogers and his crew placed second while John Curtis, another national team member and president of the Queen's sailing club, completed the sweep.

Carleton skipper Derek Vandermeer took the top Carleton position with a fourth-place finish, followed by Nurse and crew in fifth. Cressida Robson and Claire Fishlock cheered up the rear.

Lacrosse loses

by Ryan Ward

Charlatan Staff

The Carleton lacrosse club ended their season with a 10-7 loss to the McMaster Marauders at Brewer Park on Oct. 30.

Three costly penalties at the end of the game left the 1-6 Carleton team short-handed when it badly needed a goal.

Heading into the final quarter tied at seven, the lacrosse club had the opportunity to win, but three unanswered goals was a deficit they could not overcome.

With six minutes left in the fourth quarter, attack Shawn Gilmore was nailed from behind by a McMaster player and retaliated. The referees called the retaliation but not the hit from behind, leaving Carleton one man down for three minutes.

Two more Carleton penalties with two minutes left in the game put the game out of reach for the team.

"There were three calls that could be questioned," said Carleton coach Glenn Harrison. "I'm not blaming the loss on the referees, but they were to contribute in this one."

Carleton midfielder Pat Murawsky led the way with a goal and two assists. Attack Dan McWhirter had two goals, midfielder Phil Dubuc had two assists while Murphy, Gilmore and Tassé each added singles.

Socialist furniture on exhibit at gallery

by Christina Craft
Charlatan Staff

This Earthly Paradise
National Gallery of Canada
Oct. 22 — Jan. 16

British artist William Morris was a socialist who wanted to improve art for the working class, but the working class could never afford to buy his crafts.

Of his more than 285 works of art on display here — including crafts, furniture, wallpaper, tapestry and books — many have never been exhibited publicly. This exhibit is also the most comprehensive survey of Morris's work ever exhibited in North America.

Quotations by the artist are on the walls above the displays. "I spend my life in ministering to the swinish luxury of the rich," one reads.

Morris sold his crafts through Morris and Co. — a company that made expensive handmade crafts.

"Most of products of Morris and Co.

were beyond the reach of the working class home," says Douglas Schoenherr, assistant curator at the National Gallery. "Morris was aware of what he was doing and at the same time he was a socialist."

Morris's work was a reaction to the beginning of industrialization around him in Britain in the late 1800s.

"He wanted to reassert the dignity of working with your hands," says Schoenherr.

His crafts also emphasize preserving the purity of nature and country life. All his works have designs of leaves, flowers and birds.

The exhibit is broken up into several rooms, some of which are actually set up like living and drawing rooms.

Katharine Lochnan, curator for the Art Gallery of Ontario who helped put together the exhibit, says it displays Morris's works as they were meant to be viewed — his tapestry, carpets, wallpaper, furniture and his friends' pottery and paintings are combined in some of the rooms.

In one room a video shows the art of creating wallpaper. Along the walls and in the display cases are samples of Morris's wallpaper designs. The plates used to make the wallpaper are also on display. The wallpaper designs reflect Morris's main theme of nature — details of leaves and vines flow through the paper.

The most striking works in the exhibit are Morris's tapestries. They contain elaborate embroidery on silk cloth. The designs are mostly of leaves and flowers in pastel colors.

Morris was also concerned with printing as an art form and felt machines were ruining the beauty of the handmade book. To that end, he collected and published his own books.

Morris's collection of illuminated books — handwritten with colorful drawings — are displayed in two rooms. Two Chaucer volumes and several books dating from the 1400s are a part of the collection.

Also in the exhibit are paintings by Morris's friends and associates, including Dante Gabrielle Rossetti and Edward Burne Jones. The paintings by Rossetti and Burne Jones are simple and use the same soft pastel colors used by Morris in all his crafts.

Morris's wife, Jane, was the subject of many of Rossetti's paintings. Although it's not mentioned in the exhibit, when Morris's marriage broke down, Rossetti and Mrs. Morris had a well-known love affair. Some of Rossetti's paintings of Jane Morris are on display in the exhibit.

Also displayed is pottery by Morris's associate William De Morgan. Like Morris, De Morgan rebelled against the use of machines in creating crafts. His ceramics all have images of nature with flower and leaf designs.

Morris wanted his crafts and furniture to be simple. He rebelled against heavy, velvet Victorian furniture and created simpler, lighter pieces, Schoenherr says.

There are more than 60 public and private contributors to this exhibit, including artist Burne Jones's great-great-grandson who lives in Ottawa — he is an anonymous contributor to the collection.

The exhibit is an amazing collection of crafts and furniture. Most significant is that all the art was found in Canada, showing how Morris's works were able to reach out to people across the ocean.

It is definitely a must see. □ when local art and bread collide

Enriched Bread Artists
951 Gladstone Ave.
Oct. 28 — 31

It's been a long time coming.

Two and a half years ago, a small group of local artists leased studio space on the first floor of an old, abandoned bread factory at 951 Gladstone Ave.

Since then, this group has evolved into the Enriched Bread Artists, a collective headed by Laura Margita and Mark MacGuigan. It has expanded to 23 artists and the building's second floor has been added to the studio space, which includes three exhibition areas.

The Enriched Bread Artists held the grand opening of their first group exhibition on Oct. 28. Although the exhibit ran only through the weekend, anyone who is interested in visiting or working in this amazing environment is welcome to do so by appointment.

At a time when the National Gallery is spending $1.8 million on American paintings of stripes, this group is a shot in the arm for local artists looking to exhibit. This is not to deny the validity of Voice of Fire and No. 16 as art, but there are many Canadian, and indeed, many Ottawa artists whose work is equally deserving of the reputation and the price tag of these American works.

Several forms of the visual arts were on display, from sculpture and painting to performance art and photography. There were celebrations of life, of lust, of family and of womanhood to name but a few.

Among the more outstanding works were a piece by Jonathon Brownz and a painting by Diane Hiscox. Brownz's piece was a mural called We Are All Created Equal. It is composed of several photos collected together with pages from the phone book, with all the names crossed out and only the numbers showing. This mural was perhaps reflective of how, in today's society, we're all just numbers.

The Hiscox painting was a portrait of her son. In the catalogue accompanying the exhibition, it is described as the first in a series of portraits of "important people."

However, the building itself was as much a part of the show as the art. Built in 1924 by the Standard Bread Company, the building is unlike any other gallery I've ever seen before. Art galleries usually have drab off-white walls and low-key carpeting which are intended to showcase art in a pleasing and relaxing setting.

This building, however, is simply an old warehouse. The floors are concrete, plaster flakes off the walls and ceiling and one can't be entirely sure if the gouges in the floor are simply there or are intended to be part of the show.

The Standard Bread Building is first and foremost studio space for these artists. This group exhibition last weekend was the first, and is planned to be an annual event; the individual artists will also be putting on shows over the year. □ For appointments, info about upcoming events or general inquiries call 729-7632.

LETTING IT ALL

Hang Out

by José Bellemare
Charlatan Staff

Every day for at least a week, my mother reminded me to block off my Saturday night so she could take me some place mysterious.

Imagine my surprise when we ended up at Canada Hot Shots in Point Gatineau, Que.

I immediately realized where I was when I saw a man with jerry curls (greasy, long, curly hair) dancing in a G-string on a stage illuminated by rows of lights. There were mirrors everywhere. I was surprised at how glamorous it looked.

My mother reserved a table in the front on the right side of the stage. It was about 9 p.m. when we arrived.

A few women were scattered about at tables or around the stage. I actually recognized one of the girls from high school. She was by the stage with some other young teenagers, cheering the strippers on as they went about their business. At first glance, they looked like regulars.

My assumption proved true when, later in the night, they lined up at the corner of the stage with condoms in their hands, right before the host announced a condom could be traded in for a free shooter. I felt really sorry for them. How could someone hang out there every weekend? Are they really that lonely?

I also couldn't believe it when a group of women took off their bras on stage for a shooter. Do these women have morals? Or maybe they were so used to the routine, it didn't embarrass them any more.

At about 10:30 p.m., the place started to fill up.

Strippers of all kinds took turns on the stage. During their routine, women lined up at the corner of the stage with folded $2 bills in their mouths. The strippers would dance up to them with a smile, perhaps trying to be sexy or turn them on in some way, taking the money out of the women's mouths with their teeth and giving them a kiss on their mouths or cheeks. One woman must have paid at least $20 for 10 kisses.

Other women sat in complete awe with their hands dangling over the side of the stage. I've never seen so many young women in one room in all my life.

At about 11:30 p.m. my mother paid $7 for a stripper to table dance for me. The guy looked to be about four foot seven, with brown shoulder-length hair and a built body. One thing I admired was his constant, intense eye contact, but his dancing was mediocre, like the rest of the strippers.

About half an hour later, I actually felt a bit deceived when I saw the same stripper doing the same dance for another girl in the "champagne room." For $20 you apparently get a more intimate room, couches and the stripper's undivided attention. The women in this room looked like they were very serious about the whole encounter.

The last act was something to remember. The host auctioned off a chance to wash a man with a sponge in a pool of water. Water splashed on him from a bag full of water hooked on the ceiling with a shower head attached to it.

In the end, a woman paid $65 to wash his body down. A slow song played with the words, "So baby, turn out the lights."

I felt strange when I caught another stripper staring at me. I couldn't tell if he was sincerely interested in me or he just wanted me to pay to kiss him or table dance for me.

The thought disturbed me. For my first time at such an establishment, it was entertaining to watch the women screeching with glee, but I wouldn't want to be a regular.

I think I'll just stick to the normal Ottawa bars, where the guys keep their clothes on.

Rail TEC
Zaphod Beeblebrox
Nov. 5

Everything is just "great," according to Jas Campbell, co-founder and vocalist of Rail TEC.

That's his response to my first few questions. Then he asks, "Am I being too vague?"

There's no real reason why he should answer in any other way. Since its formation two years ago, Rail TEC has scored a number of remarkable achievements, including being a winner in the 1992 New Music Search, touring for two weeks in the U.K., being showcased at Much West in Vancouver and at the New Music Seminar in New York City, and playing in Toronto with such high-profile alternative acts as Curve and Carter USM.

Although there are five people in the band, Rail TEC was originally intended to be a duo. Co-founders Campbell and William Broad had been friends for a number of years, playing with various bands around Toronto. Sick of the internal politics that plague so many groups, they sat down with the idea of doing something together.

One of the first songs they wrote was "Guilty," an infectious mix of samples and beats, combined with Campbell's distinctive vocals. That song was an instant hit, and earned them a place on the CFNY New Music compilation CD. CFNY adopted Rail TEC as one of its favorite local bands, giving it regular airplay and exposure to Toronto listeners.

Rail TEC's line-up expanded during this time. Currently, it includes Campbell, Broad, bassist Jeff Thompson, drummer Pauline Hurlock (formerly of Acid Test) and keyboardist Barb Castelvi. They plan to keep it this way because, according to Campbell, "The chemistry in the band is so great that we could never add another member. Right now we're all in the same mindset and it just clicks."

After playing just five shows in Toronto last year, Rail TEC had the opportunity to spend a couple of weeks in the U.K., playing a few shows and experiencing the scene. Campbell describes the experience as "just brilliant. We were based in a town called Crew in central northern England, not far from Liverpool and Manchester. The bands and people there were just phenomenal and a lot of people were really going out of their way to help us out."

The night after their return to Toronto, the band opened for Carter USM.

Rail TEC was also featured at music industry shows in New York in 1993 and Vancouver in 1992. While Campbell remembers the Vancouver show as being a really great time, he describes the New York experience as "freaky. We took a wrong turn on the way there and ended up going through the heart of Harlem in a van full of all or gear. Some of it was like things you see on TV."

It is experiences like this, he says, which influence the band's sound more than other bands do because it's things like this that he remembers when he sits down to write.

Rail TEC's debut full-length release, Never Coming Down, was released this fall. It contains the first singles "Guilty," "I'm So High" and the title track.

Never Coming Down was designed to be listened to in its entirety. Campbell explains that this is why the songs fade into one another throughout.

"It's not just singles and filler. Bill and I discussed how when we were young you would listen to the whole side of one album and then flip it over and listen to the other side. Everything flows."

For this reason, on the CD release, the only break on the entire recording is right in the middle.

Rail TEC has been labelled a dance band, partially due to the success of its highly danceable first single. The truth is, the album has songs that portray the band's wide spectrum of influences and experiments. The music is the type that creeps up on you and then stays stuck in your head long after the album finishes.

DISCOGRAPHY

James Laid
Polygram

This release, produced by Brian Eno, has taken James in an entirely new direction.

The album is less synthesized but still maintains this Manchester band's folkish quality. Tim Booth brings his longing voice, with its falsettos and drops.

James has been around since the early eighties (formed in 1983), when they enjoyed a degree of success under the Factory record label, but the recent additions of keyboardist Mark Hunter and violinist Saul Davies have broadened their sound and helped bring in their larger audience.

The lyrics still deal with love and mysticism, but now there seems to be more spirit to the music. There's an uplifting quality to many of the songs on this album. It's very easy to hum along to "Laid" and "Low, Low, Low" is being considered as the British soccer chant for the 1994 World Cup.

Slowly James is becoming recognized as one of the most innovative bands in the rock industry. The incredible thing is that there is still so much room for them to grow.

Pet Shop Boys
VERY
EMI

Let's face it: the Pet Shop Boys are the elites.

No other group has put together such a mindless, dancy repertoire of pure pop celebrating indulgence and lust.

And even though the eighties are finally over with, the Pet Shop Boys haven't changed a bit. Their latest album's title consists of a single enigmatic word and the music is still overindulgent pop, replete with synthesizers, drum machines and the like.

The beauty of their music — and this recording is no exception — is that it sounds like it was all recorded at the same time. "Can You Forgive Her," "A Different Point of View," and "Go West" are classic PSB tunes, mainly because they sound like all the earlier hits. A special treat is the unbalanced "Yesterday, When I Was Mad."

This album is the soundtrack for the nineties' revival of the eighties.

Rose Chronicles
Dead and Gone to Heaven
Netzwerk

In their press release, Rose Chronicles say they have a real feel for their songs, but this is anything but obvious by the sound of their music.

Don't mistake me — vocalist Kirsty Thirsk has a beautiful voice, resembling Sinead O'Connor's. Unfortunately, her voice doesn't suit the band's style at all.

Rose Chronicles's sound is rather rockish, exhausting the lead guitar as the primary instrument. Thirsk could do some amazing things with a solo career or, at the very least, with a style of music that suits her voice.

The first song is titled "Awaiting Eternity." A more appropriate title would have been "A Painful Eternity," seeing as how the song stretches on for nearly six minutes of listening hell. The next three songs follow basically the same poorly put together format — heavy guitars combined with a lot of drums.

Over all the lyrical sound is impressive; they've combined angelic vocals with some superbly written lyrics. It's a real shame that the band didn't work harder at creating a more suited instrumental backdrop for the intense vocal sound.

This group has been together for only a year and a half. They need to take some time out and not just fine tune, but rearrange their sound so that it's better suited to Thirsk's voice, which is their single asset.

Realistically, success takes a lot of time and this is one band that definitely needs to pay its dues.

The Stoaters
Keep the Head
Turtle Records

Although the Stoaters call Vancouver home, it is their Scottish and Irish roots that form the base for their unique and increasingly popular sound.

Their music is difficult to categorize; it blends Celtic and folk sensibilities with a hard rock edge and an energy that is purely punk.

Hard to believe? After hearing the hard-driven guitar mingle seamlessly with traditional mandolin and violin, doubt is quickly replaced by appreciation. Keep the Head is a welcome combination of solid musicianship and passionate vocals that is immediately endearing to any fan of energetic, danceable music.

The lyrics themselves are simple yet compellingly narrative. Always intelligent, many songs have obvious political overtones with roots in Irish, Scottish and Canadian society.

However, the Stoaters are not guilty of taking themselves too seriously, enjoying a punch-line and an energetic reel or jig equally as much as making a point.

Although often likened to such bands as the Pogues and Spirit of the West, the Stoaters have a distinct sound. The only thing they have in common with these bands is their fusion of traditional and contemporary musical styles.

Energy is contagious, and the Stoaters are guilty of spreading the condition. The primary symptom of their music is an overwhelming desire to get up and dance. Keep the Head is an impressive debut release that will set traditional folk on its ear and crowds of people on their feet.

Mike Peters

Violent Femmes
Add it Up (1981-1993)
Slash Records

Buy this album. If you're a fan of this quintessential garage band, that's the only advice I can give you. The latest offering from the Milwaukee trio of Gordon Gano (vocals, guitar), Brian Ritchie (bass), and Victor Delorenzo (percussion), takes a look back at the band's 12-year history.

Although it contains samplings of each of their four major releases, Add it Up (1981-1993), is not simply a "best-of" release. It contains many tracks that have never been released, as well as obscure B-sides that true fans will appreciate to no end. The album includes live versions of their angst-ridden ballads "Kiss Off" and "Add it Up," as well as immortal selections like "Blister in the Sun" and "American Music."

If you have not previously been exposed to Brian Ritchie's playful bass rhythms and Gano's innocently passionate vocals, then this is the perfect opportunity to experience the passion, the anger and the intensity that is the Violent Femmes.

Mike Peters

Just exactly what is a Juice Pig? Don't ask us

by Mike Peters
Charlatan Staff

Corky and the Juice Pigs is a Toronto-based comedy group with sights set far higher than the Yuk Yuk's comedy circuit.

Six short years after their debut in a local Toronto contest, Sean Cullen, Phil Nichol and Greg Neale make up one of the most sought-after comedy acts in the world.

Although this might sound like an exaggeration, their résumé will easily quell any doubts. Their self-titled independent CD, released this summer, has sold over 2,000 copies and appeared in the top five on indie charts in three Canadian cities.

Plus, they've made appearances on numerous television programs, at the Just For Laughs comedy festival in Montreal and in hundreds of theatres and clubs all over the world.

Their act is difficult to describe. While it is musically based, this is not merely a novelty comedy band. Although much of their act is filled with their trademark off-the-cuff stream of consciousness improv, they are not merely an improv act. They are masters of sketch, musical and physical comedy, ranging from silly to undeniably hilarious.

The Juice Pigs would certainly be lynched if they discriminated in choosing their victims, but luckily, they pride themselves on making fun of absolutely everybody, including themselves. This quality makes them float above the ocean of political correctness. Songs like "Burn Victim Girl" and "Panda" (with the chorus "The pandas must die") best exemplify their satiric bent.

The Juice Pigs have just returned from Great Britain where they made their third appearance at the prestigious Edinburgh Fringe Festival.

"Corky was very well-received," says manager Lorne Perlmutar, in an understatement which borders on comedy in itself.

Not only were they one of seven finalists for "The Perrier," Britain's most sought-after comedy award, but the stir they created was so great that they had to postpone an Australian tour to extend their stay three extra weeks.

They also found the time to record a pilot show for BBC Radio 1 which was broadcast last month and received such a favorable response that there seems no doubt that Corky and the Juice Pigs' Circus of Freaks will become a regular addition to BBC-1 by January or February.

Despite the overwhelming international success, it isn't easy being a Canadian comedy group, explains Greg Neale. He says he loves Canada and prefers to work at home, but that "comedians have to go where the offers are." Canada, he says, just doesn't provide the environment for developing comics.

Neale can't really explain this phenomenon, but notes, "Comedy isn't taken very seriously in Canada. In Britain, they have very old comedy — that is they come from a background of great performers like Monty Python. Comedy is considered just as respectable as serious music and drama. That's how it should be. We are artists."

Neale says exposure to the international comedy scene has "broadened our view of comedy and exposed us to different styles." He notes that "our comedy has defiantly matured from when we started out — not to say we're mature. We're still idiots."

How then, can one describe Corky and the Juice Pigs?

"Well," Neale starts cautiously, "It's hard even for us to describe to us. I suppose you could call us surreal trash comedy. Or just some guys who can't get any other work." □

Those wacky wacky Juice Pigs.

Good 'toons, bad story; better take a miss

The Nightmare Before Christmas Directed by Tim Burton

The director responsible for Beetlejuice, Batman and Pee Wee's Big Adventure is back, with one of the more creative and recent movies that critics seem to be salivating in buckets about.

In this animated epic, Burton tells the story of Pumpkin King Jack Skellington who, upon stumbling into Christmas Town, decides to take over Christmas.

He spends a lot of time trying to derive a scientific explanation for Christmas, before concluding that the holiday is overrated and that the only way for Halloween to receive the attention it deserves is by taking over Christmas and eventually putting his own touches on it.

Already aware of the critical raves surrounding this movie, I was anticipating a freaky and undeniably interesting artistic flick.

Toes up, then, for the pleasant and impressive animation. And if Burton geared the movie towards those 15 and under, the toes stay up longer.

But to say this flick will hold an adult's attention would be a lie. Children's shows like The Simpsons and Tiny Toons work for adults and kids, but this is not one of them.

Most of the audience appeared to be 15 or younger and quite easy to please.

They seemed to take advantage of every single possibility to laugh. It should be mentioned that a twenty-something man cursed in dissatisfaction once the movie finished.

The story may not seem too logical at first and soon improves temporarily, but then has you wondering impatiently when exactly the movie will end.

There are some impressive scenes to watch for, such as Jack Skellington walking off the anteater-shaped cliff, the musical instruments, the spider-like way Skellington walks, the cotton-puffs of smoke exhaled by the train in Christmas Town, a two-faced mayor and the marvellous toys Halloween Town concocts for Christmas.

What will seem obvious to adults is that there's too much singing. The beginning of the movie is similar to the Munchkin bit in the Wizard of Oz. As characters started singing solos, I was reminded of Jeremy (the orange, furry singing bear, that can "do most anything").

I would definitely have enjoyed seeing more character development. But I guess you're not going to get this in a flick aimed at the under-15 crowd.

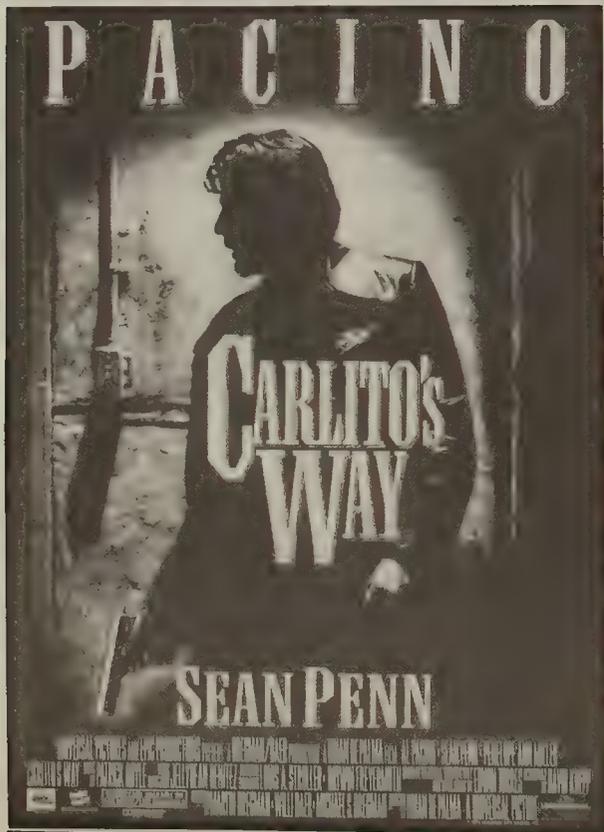

It's scary to think that some people would pay eight bucks to see this trendy less-than-an-hour-and-a-half flick.

Trendy and cute are the two adjectives that best describe this movie. Bring kids to see it. If you feel you would be missing out on too much by not going, at least see it on a Tuesday.

The biggest problem I had with this movie was that I had been exposed to exultingly favorable media coverage. Sure, it was different and imaginative, but a good movie should constitute more than that: it should have a stronger, less obvious storyline. □

We don't have to explain this to you, do we?

The Charlatan is giving away 20 double passes to Carlito's Way. These will go to the first 20 people to make their "way" (heh, heh) up to our office in Room 531 Unicentre and name three movies that Pacino guy has starred in.

The Twilight Rituals' Meaning of Life

by Ron Oro
Charlatan Staff

If you end up talking to Grant Davidson Ford, the lead singer for the Toronto four-piece Twilight Rituals, expect to be barraged with so many thoughts that it feels as if a train hit you.

At a recent show at Zaphod's, just before he and bandmates Thomas Payne (guitars, vocals), Howie Beck (drums, vocals) and Dennis Mohammed (bass) took to the stage, it was almost impossible to get Ford to talk about his music. All he really wanted to talk about was his high moral standards and what was going wrong with society.

Grant was wearing a black, French cap which he constantly fidgeted with, his hand moved constantly as he tried to convey his ideals to me.

Twilight Rituals has a fairly unique history for an up-and-coming Canadian guitar-rock band. Ford, originally from Ottawa, met up with the rest of the members of his group backstage at a "blah" Jeff Healey concert.

After that, the Rituals braved the club scenes all over Toronto for a year before getting signed to EMI. Plus, they've just got back from touring Russia, which was a learning experience.

"The bands there are really cool because they actually have something to fight against," he says.

Thus began his history lesson. "In the past Russians lived in bunkers, creating all sorts of underground newspapers and concerts. I have so much respect for their bands because they were living on the edge; anything they did against the government and they would be sent to Siberia."

This trip to Russia had a great impact on Ford, who believes Russians help their "brothers" out and this "community" attitude is evident in much of his music.

"Canadians have an uncaring attitude towards community — we are born and bred to an empty bullshit realm. In big urban centres many people are pushed together and create walls obstructing their neighbors."

Fed up with this "urban" mentality, Ford explains how he is not living the life he wants to be living, but there are certain economic realities he has to deal with.

"The band is really hot right now and we could get even more popular but that will never bring me the kind of lifestyle I want to be living. I want to cross a mountain, travel on my bicycle, get out of town and hit a stream or ocean."

Ford spent a long time searching for a band and he thinks its members have gelled together. "I've always wanted to be a team player," he says. "Bands that have this quality work together in such a way that could not ever be reproduced by an individual. Sometimes Thomas (on guitar) would come up with a melodic hook and I would carve away at it and together we would come up with a lyric."

Ford gives the impression that there is equal distribution of power among all the members, but don't get the wrong idea. Ford is the driving force behind the Rituals. It is his strong voice which is the key to the Rituals' recent successes.

"Working with other band members is hard," he says. "Every member has different goals and perspectives. We're trying to pull it all together to make something more than just catchy pop tunes."

"The lyrics are important. I am trying to get a message across, but it's more than that. The music with the lyrics together is the most important thing. Hopefully the songs will give you something to reminisce about, possibly good times, maybe different times. This quality of the music is important also."

Well, after an evening of heavy intellectual conversation, I was happy to just sit back and enjoy their tunes in what was a fine performance. Here's to reminiscing with the Rituals. □

LONG DAY IN THE UNIVERSE

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 4 TO THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 11

Thursday, November 4

Bob's Your Uncle, a Canadian band that seems to be popular with the kids, has its CD release gig at Zaphod's tonight. Cover is $7.

Jan Fabre, the bad boy of European dance, brings his dance piece Da un'altra faccia del tempo to the National Arts Centre tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 p.m.

Friday, November 5

Queen Ida and Her Zydeco Band close out what has been a fantastic See and Hear the World series tonight at 8 p.m. Go to the Grand Hall in the National Museum of Civilization and enjoy yourselves. Tickets are $16 for students.

Carleton's lunchtime concert series moves onward, with soprano Rhoda Pendleton, accompanied by a pianist, a clarinet player (clarinetist? -ed.) and a flautist. It's at 12:30 p.m. in the Alumni Theatre.

Farewell, My Concubine, winner of this year's Palme D'Or at the Cannes Film Festival, is, by all accounts, an excellent example of Chinese film at its best. It's playing at the Bytowne today through Sunday, Nov. 14 at various times so you have no excuse for missing this fine film.

Saturday, November 6

Cracker, whose Kerosene Hat album has been playing non-stop here at The Charlatan, open for Soul Asylum tonight at the Congress Centre. Tickets are $18 through Ticketmaster.

Or if (God forbid) you'd rather do something else, Ottawa's Studio Opera Guild is presenting An Evening of Opera at 8 p.m. in Tabaret Hall at the University of Ottawa. Tickets for students are $10, available at the door.

Here's an event you can tell your grandchildren about. The cast of the Degrassi rip-off Northwood will be in town, making an appearance at the Bayshore mall this afternoon. Dust off your autograph books.

Want to spend almost six hours in a darkened room with strangers? Then head down to the Mayfair and check out the testosterone-laden triple bill of Hard Target, Army of Darkness and The Thing. The fun starts at 7 p.m.

Or if your tolerance for movies is even greater, head down to Mike's Place for a B-Movie/Cult Film Festival. Two bucks gets you in. This CKCU fundraiser runs from 1 p.m. "til we can't take it anymore," says CKCU production type Peter Vamos.

For everyone who's too cool to go to the Soul Asylum show, there's a three-band hardcore show at Ottawa U's Café Alternatif. San Francisco's Naked Aggression headlines, with opening acts Foreground and Peyolite. Tickets are $6 at the door and the fun starts at 7:30 p.m.

Sunday, November 7

Give your parents a call. Tell them how you spend all your evenings studying. Beg for cash.

Monday, November 8

As part of their cult movie Mondays, the Mayfair presents the first two instalments of La Cage Aux Folles, starting, as always, at 7 p.m.

Amanda Miller's Pretty Ugly Dance Company performs innovative dance at the NAC Theatre at 8:30 p.m. tonight. Tickets are $17 and $22.

Tuesday, November 9

Here it is: The Charlatan's reading tip of the week, courtesy of production manager Kevin McKay, who—contrary to all rumors—never touched that beagle. Of Timothy Findley's Famous Last Words, he says, "A fine example of historiographic metafiction (one can guess what McKay's majoris. -ed.). Findley forces the reader to evaluate the value of truth and history in our lives in this World War II fiction."

It's a Battle of the Decades Dance at Oliver's tonight. For $3 you can dance to the music of the '60s, '70s and '80s (this sounds suspiciously like a commercial for a certain boring local radio station that just recently switched its format to all-talk -ed.). Come dressed in the garb of your favorite decade to win prize stuff. This is, by the way, another benefit for CKCU.

Wednesday, November 10

The Walk perform across town somewhere deep within the bowels of the University of Ottawa.

On In A Mellow Tone (CKCU 93.1 FM at 9 p.m.), Ron Sweetman plays records he purchased in Toronto.

Thursday, November 11

13 Engines headline tonight and tomorrow at Zaphod's. Opening tonight is Toronto's excellent femmecore outfit Chickenmilk. Cover is $7.

It's the overpriced concert of the year: Spirit of the West with Andrew Cash and the little ones. Tickets for this Congress Hall show are $21. (It's too bad the show's so expensive; Spirit of the West is one of the best live bands around -ed.)

If you've got a listing you want to appear in this handy calendar, drop us a line at Room 531 Unicentre during regular office hours or fax us at 788-4051. Listings must be in by the Friday before publication.

Hey Kids! It's The Charlatan's first ever entertainment poll.

It's simple and fun to do. Just fill out the survey, along with your name and phone number and drop it off in the special polling box at The Charlatan, Room 531 Unicentre. The final deadline is 3 p.m. Friday, Nov. 26.

The Charlatan will publish the results in our last issue of the term on Dec. 2. Plus, as an added incentive to enter, each week we'll be having a random draw for neat stuff. This week's prize is Corky and the Juice Pigs' excellent new CD! So have some fun and get your entry up to our office as soon as possible. The deadline for this first fine giveaway is 3:30 p.m. on Tuesday, Nov. 9.

Charlatan staff are eligible for the poll but not the contest.

Good luck!

Labor ruling reaction mixed

by Brent Dowdall
Charlatan Staff

The Carleton University Students' Association and its employees are still trying to determine the impact of the Ontario Labor Relations Board decision released Nov. 2.

The board ruled 2-1 to automatically unionize all of CUSA's 340 full- and part-time employees as a bargaining unit in the Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 1281.

Over the summer, some CUSA service co-ordinators tried to organize. CUSA fired Student Academic Action Bureau co-ordinator Wayne Ross July 15 and the Carleton Women's Centre co-ordinator Renée Twaddle on July 29.

At a hearing of the Ontario Labor Relations Board in late August, CUPE asked the board to reinstate Ross and Twaddle and for automatic certification of the union. CUSA presented no evidence and called no witnesses at the hearing.

The case is precedent-setting because it is the first time the board has ruled under Section 9.2 of the Ontario Labor Relations Act. The section, which came into effect Jan. 1, says the board can order automatic certification of a bargaining unit if it finds an employer interfered with the "true wishes" of employees regarding unionization.

The majority decision, dated Oct. 29, was written by board vice-chair Laura Trachuk.

She writes that evidence presented by CUPE "supports the allegations that the responding party embarked on a scheme of harassment and intimidation of union organizers and supporters."

Trachuk writes that firing Twaddle and Ross "would have a chilling effect on the members of the bargaining unit by demonstrating to them that CUSA is prepared to use its economic power to penalize employees who seek to exercise their rights under the Act, and makes it unlikely that their true wishes may be ascertained."

In a dissenting opinion, board member William Correll wrote that automatic certification was not a good idea because, as students, the employees and employer both have short-term positions and not much experience in those positions. Correll cited the "lack of management experience among the members of the executive" as one reason Ross and Twaddle were fired.

Correll also cited "the ineptness of the organizing campaign by the employees," mentioning that the organizers approached only a few people outside of a core group and held secret meetings during working hours.

CUSA employees are trying to sort out what the decision means for them.

Matt Cummings, an employee in the Unicentre Arcade, says the union is a "great idea as long as both sides keep it in perspective and neither side gets too militant. I was content before and the union won't affect me much, and if it works out I'm all for it," he says.

Monique Rosteius, part of Rooster's bar staff, says "it would be really nice if CUSA let us know what is going on. Half the time our bosses don't even know what CUSA has decided."

Other employees say they don't know much about what unionization means.

The decision means CUSA and its employees will begin negotiations on a collective agreement and has to post notices which inform employees of their rights.

CUSA finance commissioner René

Faucher says the negotiations will have to define every position and department in the association.

"Everything's from scratch and it all has to be done in conjunction with the local so it will take a long time," he says.

Faucher says the labor dispute has slowed CUSA's usual operations down.

"In all this shuffle about job descriptions and unionizing, people have lost track of the overall aim of the association, that is, the proper operation and administration of services, centres, and businesses so that students get the most out of them per dollar," Faucher says.

"I really, truly believe that a lot of work that would have been done on behalf of the students at Carleton and that would have benefited students was put on the backburner," he says.

Faucher says he is concerned a collective agreement would not permit part-time positions, where sometimes CUSA hires a person for the length of time needed to complete a project.

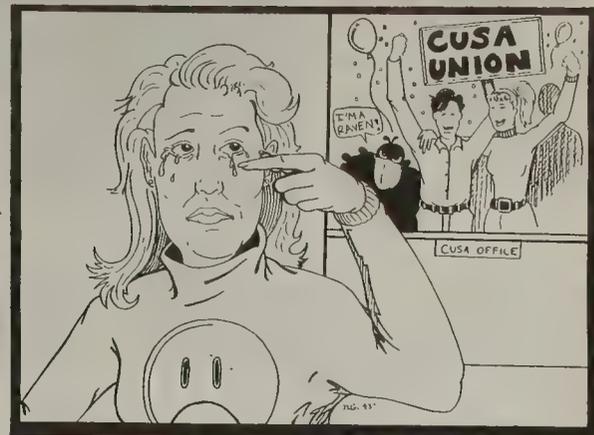

If the agreement is not "flexible enough" to hire short-term employees, Faucher says those projects may not get done.

CUSA President Lucy Watson repeated her earlier statements that CUSA wanted the board to order a vote of all employees on whether to join a union or not, instead of automatically certifying all CUSA employees.

But Ross says Watson couldn't care less about a vote.

"If one should wish to have a vote, then why would one intimidate people and restrict them from being able to express their opinions on a union freely? Hence, she (Watson) has compromised a vote. The labor board seems to agree with me," Ross says.

Arts councillor John Edwards says the executive could have handled the situation better.

He says CUSA should have given a reason for firing Ross and Twaddle besides "just cause."

"I think they bungled it," says Edwards. "For a lot of the summer they (the executive) were obsessed with it and unfortunately I don't think anything else has gotten done during the summer."

In June, Janet Burrows, a co-ordinator of the Carleton Disability Awareness Centre, wrote a letter with the other co-ordinator Sheryl Ananny to other service co-ordinators saying they couldn't support a union drive at that time. At the time, Burrows said it was because "not all service co-ordinators were invited or included in union meetings."

Burrows says both CUSA and the service co-ordinators have spent energy on the labor dispute instead of on providing services.

"We spent the whole summer and a good part of the early fall involved in court cases and negotiations," says Burrows.

"We've been very consumed by the dealing of a union and we haven't resolved stuff that should have been resolved months ago, in terms of organization and in terms of knowing what each other's services are doing."

In September, Watson estimated the total cost to CUSA from the hearings at $2,500. She now says the hearings will cost CUSA "closer to $5,000."

Faucher told The Charlatan in October that CUSA's legal bill for labor matters up to but not including the August board hearings was $17,793.81 and that CUSA had budgeted $30,000 for legal fees for the year.

"The legal budget is probably toast," says Edwards. "I hope it doesn't mean more cuts in services but we have to find the money to pay for (the legal bill)." □

Hate Week passes some by

by David Hodges
Charlatan Staff

Although Hate Hurts Week took place from Nov. 1 to Nov. 4, some students say they didn't even know it occurred.

The week is supposed to raise awareness among students about various forms of discrimination.

There were six events advertised, including a talk about homophobia and racism by Makeda Silvera, the National Film Board film Wisecracks about female comedians, an Ottawa Police forum on hate crimes, a discussion on homophobia and fear of people with disabilities, a lecture on women and AIDS, and a film about the persecution of witches called Burning Times.

But some students say the event was poorly publicized.

"I didn't hear anything about it. There wasn't enough promotion," says Adeel Ahmed, a third-year psychology student.

There were about 40 people at the Silvera talk, about 20 at the hate crimes forum and 20 at the discussion on homophobia and disabilities, says Peter Nogalo, co-ordinator of the Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Centre.

While most co-ordinators say they saw the value of the events, Nogalo says a better job could have been done with the planning.

"The events went pretty well, but the organization could have been better. Events were not well publicized," says Nogalo.

"Hate Hurts Week lacked in planning this year," says Heather Farrow, a coordinator of the Ontario Public Interest Research Group at Carleton. "(The week) was pretty successful, but there was room for improvement," she says.

"In the middle of midterms, it's a poor time to hold Hate Hurts Week. You can't expect students to have time for extra events," says Troy Ross, a third-year psychology student.

Theresa Cowan, CUSA's director of services, says Hate Hurts Week wasn't planned until October.

Adding to the confusion was the incorrect date given in CUSA's day planner. It says Hate Hurts Week started on Nov. 8.

"It was (due to) a miscommunication," says Cowan.

Sheryl Ananny, a co-ordinator of the Carleton Disability Awareness Centre, says Hate Hurts Week was first talked about on Sept. 30 at a meeting to discuss upcoming events.

"Hate Hurts Week didn't get going until October. It was late. Word didn't get out to students as well as it could have," says Janet Burrows, a CDAC co-ordinator.

Renée Twaddle, co-ordinator of the Carleton Women's Centre, says she didn't think Hate Hurts Week was poorly or-

Fee increase opponents miss deadline

by Anthony Pangalos
Charlatan Staff

Some students are saying the referendum campaign about fee increases to the Canadian Federation of Students was one-sided.

But the Carleton University Students' Association says it conducted the referendum by the books.

The CFS researches student issues, acts as a lobby group for students and provides services like Travel Cuts for students. It is also a member of the International Union of Students, which helps defend student rights.

On Nov. 9 and 10, students voted in a referendum on whether or not to increase their fees to the Canadian Federation of Students by $4. The results of the vote were not available at press time but will be posted in the CUSA office Nov. 11.

A Yes vote will increase student fees to CFS by $2 and to CFS-Ontario by $2 as well. A No vote will leave the fees at $4 and $3 respectively.

A Yes committee officially lobbied students for support to increase the fees, but there was no official representation on behalf of the No side.

After missing the Nov. 2 deadline to register as a committee with CUSA's chief electoral officer, a group of students supporting the No side was not allowed to campaign officially for the referendum.

Daren Givoque, chair of the unofficial No committee and a former CUSA councillor, said the referendum was conducted unfairly, because No supporters weren't allowed to participate.

Official recognition as a campaign committee gives each side $150 to spend on their campaign. It also allows a committee to put up posters. Any posters not stamped by the chief electoral officer are taken down.

"Everybody is playing by the rules," said Rob Jamieson, CUSA's vice-president intern. "It has been a completely legal and fair referendum. The opportu-

A student makes his mark at a polling booth.

Section 7.2 of CUSA's electoral code states that the chief electoral officer must publicize the date and time of an organizing meeting for any Yes and No committee conducted during a referendum at least four school days before the meeting, in The Charlatan and on posters.

James Rilett, CUSA's chief electoral officer, said the referendum was run fairly. He said an ad ran in The Charlatan Oct. 28, publicizing the Nov. 2 No committee organizing meeting and the meeting was publicized at two CUSA council meetings on Oct. 18 and Oct. 26.

"I see nothing wrong with it constitutionally," he said. "(CUSA) checked with me before they did anything."

On Nov. 7, the unofficial No committee posted about 800 posters which were almost all torn down the next day, said Givoque. He said the No committee also lobbied classrooms and tried to inform students about the No side at the voting booths.

Rilett said he asked the No supporters to stop campaigning near the booths, nized as a committee and they were given the chance to and they never did," said Rilett. "Some people say it's not fair. My hands are tied and where were they a week ago? It's not that big a deal to come to one meeting or even to let me know they were interested in it."

Givoque criticized CUSA President Lucy Watson for distributing pro-CFS pamphlets during the campaign, but Watson said it's the association's responsibility to inform students.

"We have an obligation to make sure the information gets out to the students. We don't have an obligation to run a No committee or encourage people to come out to a No committee. That option was open for students and they chose not to take it," said Watson.

"What I am distributing is what the federation puts out and I specifically have an obligation to make sure students have that information because we are a member school."

CFS chair Carl Gillis justified the need for an increase.

"We haven't had a fee increase since 1981 and over the years the cost of fighting for students becomes more and more expensive," said Gillis. "We continue to work and lobby the government and the fighting is hard when you don't have the money."

Kim Newton, chair of the Yes committee, said "ideally what we would like to have happen is to have no financial barriers to post-secondary education."

But Givoque questioned the effectiveness of the CFS, noting that although Carleton has been a member for the past 12 years, tuition fees have increased by at least 120 per cent.

"If we were not there, tuition fees will be more than if we were not there," Gillis said. "You have to have somebody fighting for this issue and if we're not, who will?"

SECURITY BRIEFS

Security seeks assault witnesses

by Brandie Weikle
Charlatan Staff

The department of university safety is looking for people who may have witnessed the assault of a female student on Tuesday, Nov. 2.

The student was approached at about 2:30 in the afternoon in a high-traffic area of the tunnels near the Steacie Building, says Len Boudreault, the department's assistant director.

Her assailant grabbed her, kissed her on the lips, threatened to harm her if she screamed and then ran off, says Boudreault.

"There have got to be witnesses," he says. The victim described the assailant as a white male about 20 years old, five foot 11 with a medium build and blond hair that is long on top and short on the sides, says Boudreault.

He was wearing a white shirt, blue jeans, a jean jacket and was clean-shaven, says Boudreault.

A safety poster publicizing the incident says the assailant's first name is Adam. Boudreault says the victim believes her assailant is a student at Carleton.

"We'll be interested in hearing from anyone who thinks that they might know this individual or who thinks they can identify this person," says Boudreault.

The case is under investigation by the department and the Ottawa Police. □

Flasher seen in Southam Hall

by Brandie Weikle

Carleton's incessant flasher problem has not gone away.

A male entered the women's washroom on the fourth floor of Southam Hall on Monday, Nov. 1 at 1:40 p.m., says Boudreault.

The man indecently exposed himself to the washroom's occupants before he left the area, he says.

A safety poster says the assailant is a Caucasian in his mid-20s with dark, medium-length hair.

It says he is about six feet tall with a medium build and was wearing a green raincoat and white running shoes.

His description does not match that of any of the previous flashers on campus, says Boudreault. □ ganized.

"Although there is always last-minute scrambling, I thought it was better organized than usual. We reached people who were not aware of these issues and weren't just preaching to the converted," says Twaddle.

Cowan says during the summer nobody was interested or willing to help organize the week.

Nogalo says Hate Hurts Week was talked about vaguely during the summer and that facilitator training and orientation for frosh week took priority with him. "No real planning was going on (in the summer)," he says.

BACHELOR OF EDUCATION

The BEd Degree program at Nipissing is a one-year limited enrolment program taught at primary/junior, junior/intermediate and intermediate/senior levels.

Our small class size of approximately 35 students ensures personal attention from professors. Our practice teaching policy allows you, in most cases, to choose the location of your practice teaching.

Options offered during the year are Education of Native Children, Second Language Teaching: French or Religious Education in the Roman Catholic Separate Schools.

Native playwright talks of despair and hope

by Andrea Wiebe
Charlatan Staff

Aboriginal playwright Tomson Highway surprised his audience when he spoke at Carleton on Nov. 4.

His speech was entitled "Rebuilding Strong Communities: Aboriginal Self-Government," but the title was much more formal than the lecture.

Highway held a very informal talk and was quite dramatic as he walked around the stage in Porter Hall. He told the crowd of about 200 people, using a lot of personal anecdotes, what it was like to be a Native person growing up in Canada.

"It was like we were sitting in his living room and not in a lecture hall," said Heidi Van Dyk, a second-year Canadian Studies major.

Highway has written poetry, short stories, a novel, a screenplay, scripts for a TV mini-series, as well as plays such as The Rez Sisters and Dry Lips Oughta Move to Kapuskasing.

The evening began with an entrance song by the drumming group Big Stone Singers to set the mood.

Highway, 41, was born on a Manitoba reserve about 1,200 kilometres north of Winnipeg. He said his reserve was as poverty-stricken as Davis Inlet, an Innu settlement in Newfoundland.

He was sent to The Pas, Man., at age six where he began school. This is where Highway says his "indoctrination . . . at the hands of the Roman Catholic church" began in a residential school.

"We (Native children) were taught, as five- and six-year-olds, that we had no culture, no history, no past, our languages were third-rate, our culture was third-rate, our lifestyle was third-rate . . . and this other system of (European) thought was better somehow," he said.

Highway said this cultural conflict followed him throughout his life and made him very lonely.

He said he didn't know why he felt that way until he realized, in his 20s, that he felt so lost because he had been forced to give up his beliefs, which kept him spiritually centred.

Highway spoke about the difference between living in Toronto, where he has lived for the past 15 years, and living on the reserve. He said people living in the city have lost their spiritual roots because they have so many material things they have nothing left to want.

Highway also spoke about the richness of language.

"I want to be able to conquer Ojibway and Spanish next. By the time I die, at around 80 or 85, it's one of my ambitions to be fluent in seven languages." He said he speaks French, English and Cree.

Highway shared stories about his family as well.

He said he was the second youngest of 12 children in a family of 14. Only six members of his family are still alive. "Death was a constant presence," says Highway.

However, Highway said he was very happy as a child living on the reserve, where he had a sense of balance.

"It was just us, and the land, and this immense silence. It was so beautiful to grow up that way," he said.

While his speech concentrated on spirituality, Highway told many stories about his life and how he got to where he is today. "The only thing I want to offer to you people this evening is hope," said Highway.

He talked about how his father was a caribou hunter, a fisherman and a trapper. "So to top it all off, I'm politically incorrect," says Highway. "I also drink beer and eat meat, and I'm crazy about country and western music!"

But there certainly was a serious side to his words.

"I thought he was fantastic," said Amanda Gibbs, a student who attended the lecture. "I had read a lot of Tomson Highway's plays but I'd certainly never heard him speak. I have seen his plays performed as well."

"He has such intensity and such energy and he's just so, sort of, steeped in performing that when he speaks to a crowd like this it's really wonderful," she said.

Diana Lester, also a student at Carleton, said she enjoyed his speech. "He got to the point, a couple of times, where he didn't want to go on. It must be difficult to reveal your whole life in front of about 400 people."

Highway left a big impression on the audience, including Madeline Dion Stout, the director of the Centre for Aboriginal Research and Culture, who closed the evening by saying Highway is "a really cool cat." □

Rae says universities won't get more

by Franco D'Orazio
Charlatan Staff

Ontario universities should not expect any increases in funding from the provincial government in the foreseeable future, Carleton University President Robin Farquhar told the university's board of governors in a meeting Oct. 27.

According to Farquhar, Premier Bob Rae conveyed this at a recent meeting of the Council of Ontario Universities.

"In an off-the-record remark, he (Rae) confirmed that after the post-social-contract era, the province will not be returning to the old days," Farquhar said.

The social contract, otherwise known as Bill 48, is the province's plan to save $2 billion a year for three years by cutting wages, benefits and positions of nearly one million public sector workers, including those at universities.

However, Farquhar explained, the premier stressed that any new funds generated by tuition fee increases "should not be used to increase the salaries of (university officials), but should be used to improve services for students."

Farquhar said he was told by Ontario Education Minister Dave Cooke last month to expect "some significant raises in tuition fees next year."

Farquhar and Guy Caron, the president of the University of Ottawa, met with Cooke in a "breakfast meeting" on Oct. 8 in which they university financing.

Farquhar added the annual operating grant Carleton receives from the Ontario government will decrease by 1.2 per cent for next year, Farquhar said.

Carleton's budget planning office anticipated an operating grant of $100.7 million for this year. But this summer's social contract reduced it eight per cent, said Spruce Riordon, Carleton's vice-president of finance and administration. □

Maclean's survey sparks criticism

by Arn Keeling and Michael Mainville
Charlatan Staff

Once again, mixed emotions surround the annual Maclean's magazine universities issue, released Nov. 8.

For the third year in a row, Maclean's has published its popular ranking of Canadian universities. Last year, the magazine sold over 63,000 copies, their second biggest seller ever.

In 1991, Maclean's generated a storm of controversy with its first survey of universities, which rated the country's universities in one large group of 46. Last year, Maclean's revamped the survey to create three categories of universities.

This year saw its share of changes, with two new institutions in Ontario participating (Nipissing University in North Bay and Ryerson Polytechnic University in Toronto), with a total of 51 universities being ranked.

As well, Carleton and Memorial University, two previously ranked universities, decided not to participate, but were included in the survey using some data submitted last year as well as some updated data from sources outside the universities.

Many university administrators say the survey is a useful tool for high-school students, but almost all are critical of the methods and data the magazine uses to evaluate the universities.

THE METHODOLOGY

Like last year, Maclean's ranks universities according to 21 criteria in five categories. The categories include student body (20 per cent), classes (18 per cent), faculty (20 per cent), finances (10 per cent), library (12 per cent), and reputation (20 per cent). These categories take into account criteria including class size, number of tenured faculty, average entrance grades of students and the opinions of some top Canadian executives about graduates of a particular university.

It then compiles the information and ranks universities into three groups: primarily undergraduate institutions, comprehensive universities (those with both graduate and undergraduate programs) and schools with major commitments to PhD and medical programs.

Carleton students, admin say survey is inaccurate

by Tanya Workman
Charlatan Staff

Carleton administrators and students are critical of Carleton's ranking in this year's Maclean's magazine survey of universities released Nov. 8, saying it is inaccurate and incomplete.

Carleton was ranked ninth out of 13 in the comprehensive university category of the survey, which includes universities offering "a significant amount of research activity and a wide range of programs at the graduate and undergraduate levels."

Last year Carleton was sixth out of 12 in the same category. Pat O'Brien, Carleton's director of public relations, says Carleton's lower rating is irrelevant, because the survey's numbers are inaccurate.

"You're assuming that last year's six meant something," says Pat O'Brien, director of public relations. "What we don't want to do is to give any credibility to the methodology that was used."

O'Brien is critical of the information Maclean's collects to compile its annual survey and says he doesn't think the survey gives an accurate picture of any

THE RANKINGS

Predictably, the rankings haven't changed much from last year.

Among schools with major commitments to PhD and medical programs, McGill came out on top once again, but Queen's (second this year) and the University of Toronto (third this year) swapped positions.

The comprehensive category also saw some changes as Simon Fraser University in Burnaby, B.C., overtook first place from the University of Waterloo, who fell to second this year. The University of Victoria rounded out the top three, advancing from last year's fourth place position. The most noticeable changes in this category came from Carleton (sixth to ninth) and Memorial (eighth to 11th).

At the primarily undergraduate level, the top three universities haven't changed at all since last year, with New Brunswick's Mount Allison University at the top, followed by Trent University in Peterborough and Acadia in Nova Scotia. The only significant changes include a move for Lethbridge University in Alberta from last year's ninth position up to fourth place and a major drop for Thunder Bay's Lakehead University to 18th from 12th.

THE REACTION

Although some universities were happier than others with their rankings, the Maclean's methodology has come under fire from some administrators.

The survey promotes old-line thinking and is nothing to get excited about, says Joseph Lloyd Jones, assistant vice-president of institutional research and planning at the University of Ottawa.

"I'm a critic of this whole approach," says Jones. "The reputation survey is a bit hokey."

The University of Ottawa dropped one place to ninth out of 15 in the medical/doctoral category, a slip Jones attributes to the improved showing of the University of Caigary.

While the University of Ottawa is pleased with this year's rankings, Jones says he hopes students don't give it much attention.

"I think students will look at it. They will talk about it," he says, but he hopes they won't use it to evaluate their choice.

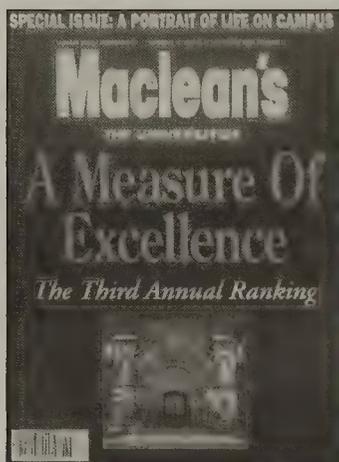

Another university that fared worse than last year was Monreal's Concordia University, which fell from last year's 10th position in the comprehensive category to 12th in this year's survey.

Ken Whittingham, Concordia's public relations director, says he doesn't think the survey will have any effect on students seeking admission to university.

"While the Maclean's survey does provide some broad, comparative data, there is no evidence to suggest that university enrolments or, indeed, admissions applications, have been affected in any way by the types of ratings published in magazines such as Maclean's."

Simon Fraser University is pleased with its first-place standing this year. However, a spokesperson for the university said while he feels the survey is a good attempt to rate schools, it's not perfect.

Comprehensive Universities — Overall Ranking

This year, Carleton was docked 50 points out of a total 1,000 point score for not submitting data for the survey.

In 1991, Carleton placed 44th out of 46 universities and then was criticized for submitting incorrect data. Dennis Forcese, then-vice-president academic, resigned following a report which placed him with the responsibility for the faulty statistics.

In a press release Sept. 16, President Robin Farquhar said Carleton wouldn't participate this year because spending money on the survey wasn't the best way to use students' and taxpayers' money.

O'Brien says Farquhar, the vice-presi-

"I think it's difficult to measure the product that universities produce. Different universities have different goals and that is not reflected by the Maclean's survey," says Ken Monnell, SFU's director of media and public relations.

However, Monnell says he feels the survey is definitely a useful tool and could be one of the many ways students evaluate universities.

Trent also fared well in the rankings for the second year in a row. But a spokesperson for the university says the methodology is flawed.

"It's obviously arbitrary. The criteria Maclean's selects doesn't suit every institution," says Susan Wheeler, director of communications.

Wheeler says the magazine arbitrarily selected its criteria and is trying to define the perfect university without looking at specific factors.

"Maclean's has their own idea of what the perfect university should be and if you are close to that you have a better ranking," says Wheeler. "They should use only general information instead. The ranking is a strictly commercial device."

However, Ann Dowsett Johnston, Maclean's assistant managing editor, says "that's baloney."

"I'm very proud of the methodology," says Dowsett Johnston. "It's for the benefit of students that we do this."

Dowsett Johnston says Maclean's consulting statistician Georges Lemaitre would definitely not agree that the system is flawed. "He is a well-trained professional. He knows what he's doing," says Dowsett Johnston.

However, the Maclean's survey should not be the only resource students use, she says. "Anybody who is smart enough to go to university is smart enough to get all the information available."

Dowsett Johnston says the survey is justified because of the information it provides and how it demonstrates university accountability.

dents and deans of the university made the decision not to participate in the survey because they felt it would cost too much money to compile the data. He says it would cost the university about $100,000 to research the information the magazine needed.

Lucy Watson, president of the Carleton University Students' Association, says the university's lower ranking doesn't surprise her because of the way the magazine compiles information.

"I think it shows how ineffective and inefficient the survey is if they are using last year's data," says Watson. "I don't think the Maclean's survey takes into consideration the uniqueness of each university or institution."

Watson says CUSA supported the university's decision not to participate in the survey.

Ann Dowsett Johnston, Maclean's assistant managing editor, says she is surprised that CUSA would support the administration's decision. She says the university is not being accountable to its

Tuition hikes coming, student leaders claim

by John Steinbachs
Charlatan Staff

Student leaders say they are bracing for news this month of a possible tuition hike of 20 to 30 per cent for the next school year.

Although Carleton's administration has not announced plans for the increases, many student leaders said they feel the hikes are inevitable.

Student concern about substantial tuition hikes began this summer, when the Council of Ontario Universities released a report which called for an increase in tuition fees between 30 and 50 per cent for some programs over the next two years.

Gillis: sees hikes "above 10 per cent."

For each of the last three years, maximum tuition increases have been set at seven per cent by the provincial government. The government is expected to announce the new maximum levels for 1994-95 some time in November.

David Hubka, vice-president external of the Carleton Graduate Students' Association, says a larger tuition hike is inevitable. "We have the information that there definitely will be a hike."

He says he believes there will be a 30-per-cent tuition hike, but he says his concern is helping his constituents deal with the fee increases.

The government will be asking students to "bite the bullet" if it goes ahead with an increase, says Michel Roy, president of Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 2323, which represents teaching and research assistants at Carleton.

"There's no question another increase will have severe implications," says Roy.

Roy says the government is forcing students to live below the poverty line by increasing tuition.

Even if the government announces a raised ceiling on tuition fee levels, individual universities' boards of governors must approve a tuition increase for their own schools.

Jim Watson, Ottawa city councillor for Capital Ward and a member of Carleton's board of governors, says no proposals to increase tuition have been presented to him on the board.

But he says he hopes the board would not vote for a 30-per-cent hike. "I hope to God they wouldn't vote for that."

Watson says a hike in tuition would limit some students' chances of going to university and "close the open door policy on which Carleton was founded."

Although some consider the fee hikes inevitable, some student leaders are still lobbying the government for no increase.

Carl Gillis, chair of the Canadian Federation of Students, says although the Ministry of Education has announced the tuition ceiling will be raised, he does not believe the minister, David Cooke, will follow the Council of Ontario Universities' recommendations.

He says the CFS is carrying on "feverous lobbying" to try to lessen the severity of the hike.

"I know it will be above 10 per cent," says Gillis.

He says the province is banking on the hope that students won't speak up until after the hike has gone through, but people have to stand up now and voice their protests before it happens.

Lucy Watson, president of Carleton

University Students' Association, says she also expects a tuition hike between 20 to 30 per cent. Watson says she doesn't think Carleton's administration understands how hard it is for students to make payments on tuition, books and other expenses.

Watson says administration does not have a problem with the cutting of grants from the province to the university, as long as they can raise tuition fees.

To protest the proposed tuition hikes, Watson says CUSA set up a phone booth in Baker Lounge from which students could call their local members of provincial parliament and voice their complaints. CUSA has also been circulating a petition which is being sent to the minister of education and Ontario Premier Bob Rae.

CFS' glossy Student Saver not a corporate conflict, says Gillis

by Brent Dowdall
Charlatan Staff

This year's Canadian Federation of Students' Student Saver is filled with discounts from corporate sponsors, but the CFS chair says that doesn't contradict its opposition to corporate influence in universities.

The Student Saver is a pamphlet of coupons for products from large businesses, such as Coca-Cola, Mr. Sub and 7-Eleven, as well as from local businesses including Yucatan Liquor Stand, Bronson Pizza and Hartman's.

The Student Saver was started shortly after CFS was formed in 1981 and about 300,000 are issued every year to students. It has always contained either paid advertising or student discount offers.

But unlike the simpler look of previous editions, this year's pamphlet has a large, glossy ad for Coca-Cola on the back cover, as well as a Coca-Cola ad on the front as large as the CFS logo.

CFS chair Carl Gillis says the Student Saver contains corporate sponsors because students use corporate products.

"This is one of the services we run to help save student's money, because students drink Coke," Gillis says.

Gillis says the CFS is opposed to increased corporate influence and control over university administrations, but that doesn't mean CFS can't do business with the corporate community.

"We want post-secondary education to stay public," he says. "But we're critical of government."

CFS isn't the only student organization forced to increase their search for corporate funding, says Andrea Calver, the coordinator of the Ontario Public Interest Research Group-Toronto.

"It's a sorry state that CFS and other groups have to go to corporations to get the money to get their message out," she says. "It's happening on all levels, including student government."

Calver says the University of Toronto Students Administrative Council contracted its cafeteria space to multinationals such as Subway and Taco Bell.

"It's amazing the amount of energy spent by administrations on all levels courting corporations," says Calver.

students by refusing to release new information on the school.

"You deserve to be told if the classes have been cut... We're pointing a finger and saying you have to give this (information) to the kids."

But Sujoy Bhattacharyya, a fourth-year biochemistry student, says he thinks Carleton made the right decision not to participate.

"I don't pay much attention to it (the survey) because it's hard to say that one school is so much better than another," says Bhattacharyya. "I think they have a right not to participate."

"It's not a good representation of what it's like to come here," says Jenn Green, a first-year psychology student. "I think people shouldn't choose what school they are going to go to based on a survey in Maclean's."

Dowsett Johnston also says the cost of compiling data is not nearly as high as the university claims and shouldn't take as much effort as O'Brien says. She says it took one university only two days to compile their data and that time and money constraints shouldn't be an excuse for not submitting it.

Carleton's decision not to submit any data came as a surprise to Maclean's, according to Dowsett Johnston. She says the magazine did not hear anything about the decision until close to the deadline for submission at the end of August.

Dowsett Johnston maintains that Maclean's survey is useful to students who are trying to decide on what university to go to. All the information students need may not be in the survey, she says, but the format of the rankings does help them to compare universities.

"Until there is a different forum for this information, what is the alternative?"

Queen's students end paper's funding

by Susie Haley
Charlatan Staff

Controversy has arisen at Queen's University over a referendum to withdraw funding from one of the university's student newspapers.

In a referendum held on Oct. 13 and 14, Queen's arts and science students voted 55.6 per cent in favor of discontinuing funding for a controversial publication called Surface.

Some students who have accused the newspaper of being racist and sexually explicit were behind the campaign to cut the paper's funding.

Last March, the Arts and Science Undergraduate Society voted to guarantee funding levels for Surface at $6,000 per year for the next five years.

However, ASUS President Jenn Steeves said she will support the cancellation of funding despite her personal support for the paper.

"I ran on a platform of supporting the paper. I also ran on a platform of being accountable to students," she said.

Surface, though, may not have lost its funding for sure.

In a Nov. 4 special general meeting, called by the ASUS and open to all arts and science students, the results of the referendum were deemed to be non-binding because the ASUS constitution had no details about how to deal with the referendum results.

At the meeting, the debate regarding the legitimacy of the referendum resulted in the introduction of two motions. The first motion, stating that the October referendum cutting the paper's funding be passed, was defeated by nine votes.

The second motion, that all ASUS referenda be made binding by a decision of the ASUS council, passed in a vote of 50 to 23. So, until the council decides whether or not this motion should include the Surface question, the paper will retain its funding.

After the referendum, David Anderson, Surface production manager, told The Queen's Journal, "We tried to get our message across, that our mandate is to provide a forum for marginalized forms of expression on the campus."

Both Anderson and Junipero Lagtapon, the paper's editor, criticized the anti-Surface campaign's emphasis on the issue of funding.

"No one really cares about the funding," said Anderson. "It is 59 cents per arts and science student."

But Andrew Dick, leader of the anti-Surface campaign, said, "... Surface is not the only voice for marginalized groups, it is the voice for a racist elite."

The paper has raised controversy since its founding in the 1988-89 academic year by political science student Gordon

Laird. Much of the debate about the future of the paper has centred around its questionable content in the past.

This year, the editors of Surface had hoped to avoid further problems with the paper's content by forming an ASUS/Surface relations committee, as well as a working group to make Surface more accountable to arts and science students.

While there is hope among some students that Surface will survive even if its funds are eventually suspended, Michael Carnegie, vice-chair of the anti-Surface campaign, has proposed that ASUS create a new paper.

Carnegie said he believes a preferable situation would be one in which ASUS "not only recommended the editor but in fact (had) a bit of power of the editor."

In its first three years, Surface included articles and stories focusing on issues such as logging, censorship and abortion.

In September 1991, however, Surface's first issue of the year included an article titled "A message from the Queen," in which the author stated "jesus (sic) was a flaming faggot" and "we will kill any and all queer bashers slowly."

Also that year, there was a regular column entitled Around Town with the Woman (sic) of Brown that was formally accused of being racist by one student.

Finally, in 1992-93, Surface published a sex issue, in which a woman described the torture and murder of white males in an article entitled "How to Make Love to a White Boy," and the centrepiece of the issue was "a collage featuring homoerotic images interspersed with pictures of prominent male Queen's community members," according to the Queen's Journal. Critics of the paper cited the sex issue as a reason to suspend the paper's funding.

But while the paper has offended some students, there was also widespread support for the paper. An Oct. 8 editorial in the Queen's Journal read, "The Journal has upset people, too; but because it usually reflects a status quo perspective, its right to exist and claim a portion of student fees is never questioned. Sure, Surface may cross the line sometimes — but this is part of the importance of its role in the Queen's community. The status quo needs to be challenged and questioned." □

Drop-outs: the perils of not playing by the Maclean's rules

by Michael Mainville
Charlatan Staff

This summer, while most Canadian universities were compiling data for the annual Maclean's magazine university survey, two institutions were using their resources in ways they consider more important.

Carleton and Memorial University in St. John's, Nfld., refused to participate in this year's survey. Both universities suffered a drop in their ranking, Memorial falling to eighth from 11th and Carleton falling to ninth from sixth in the comprehensive university category.

Arthur May, the president of Memorial University, said in a press release the Maclean's survey is "absurd." May said the university refused to participate because the survey is neither statistically nor academically sound.

"It is our firm belief that the Maclean's rankings misinform the public about Canadian universities. The university would have provided their readers better information if they had simply published the raw data without using rankings."

May also was critical of the magazine for including Memorial after the university asked not to be included in the rankings.

"This proves that they are not constrained by the facts. As far as we're concerned, they flunk out in social science and in journalistic ethics."

Carleton also opted out of this year's survey, but for some different reasons.

Carleton decided not to participate mainly because of cutbacks and lack of staff, said Carleton President Robin Farquhar on Sept. 16, when he announced Carleton's decision. He said the university spent about $100,000 collecting the data for the magazine's second survey in 1992.

Carleton was in the midst of social contract negotiations when Maclean's request for data came in this summer, says Pat O'Brien, director of public relations and information services.

O'Brien also says the methodology is extremely flawed.

"Universities are very complex institutions and organizations and to try to qualify them... to one number just can't be done," he said.

The magazine decided to use last year's data for the two non-participating universities and also penalize them 50 points (out of a possible 1,000) for "lack of public accountability," says Ann Dowsett Johnston, the magazine's assistant managing editor.

While Dowsett Johnston says non-participating universities are withholding information from the public, both Memorial and Carleton are trying alternative methods to be informative.

Memorial is publishing a statistical document that provides similar information to that of the Maclean's survey.

O'Brien says Carleton is in the midst of working with other Ontario universities to prepare performance indicators which would be made available to the public. □

Carleton student develops navigation device

by Fraser Needham
Charlatan Staff

A Carleton student has attracted interest in a navigational device he has developed to help the visually impaired.

Charles LaPierre, a first-year master's student in electrical engineering, has developed a device called Navigation Visually Impaired, or NVI. It can tell the visually impaired person exactly where they are and can make travel much easier.

LaPierre, a Sudbury native, is himself legally blind, which means he has less than 10 per cent of 20/20 vision.

NVI uses a satellite receiver, a laptop computer and a voice synthesizer. Every time the user of NVI moves, their co-ordinates are registered on the receiver. These co-ordinates then enter the laptop and are matched with a place on a map that has the location pre-programmed. The location is turned into voice by the voice synthesizer which the user hears through headphones.

Right now, the user would have to carry around all that equipment. LaPierre says he is now working on making it a smaller unit as part of his master's degree. He says there is no problem scaling it down but says he needs the right technology to produce a smaller device.

John Knight, a Carleton electrical engineering professor who acts as LaPierre's master's adviser, says it is a "fantastic project."

LaPierre says the idea originally came to him as a topic for his undergraduate thesis at Carleton, because he has trouble travelling in a place he doesn't already know.

"I have always had to get right in front of a street sign to read it," says LaPierre. "If there was not one (sign) on every corner, this was a problem."

However, LaPierre's own needs were not the only incentive for NVI. "I wanted to give something back to the groups, like CNIB (Canadian National Institute for the Blind), that have helped me so much," says LaPierre.

LaPierre is also quick to point out that NVI is not just for the visually impaired.

"It could possibly have several uses, for example tourism, is just one." The system could tell tourists where they are when they are in a strange place.

LaPierre's original idea was to use a bar code system, similar to the ones used in grocery stores. With this system, machines would be set up on different street corners to read someone's card and tell them where they were. However, LaPierre quickly realized that this system would be too cumbersome and costly.

LaPierre was then informed of the Global Positioning System (GPS) by Robert Harrison, a professor of electrical engineering at Carleton. GPS is a group of 24 satellites, which take in location co-ordinates. Harrison pointed out that LaPierre could access navigational co-ordinates from such a system through a GPS receiver.

LaPierre obtained a GPS receiver from Eric Dekamp, a professor in earth sciences at Carleton, and got a voice synthesizer from the department of computer systems.

The tools for NVI were set in place. LaPierre entered a map of Carleton into his laptop computer. Using these three elements (GPS receiver, laptop, and voice synthesizer), NVI was tested on Carleton campus and it worked.

LaPierre won the Social Awareness Award at the Ontario Engineering Competition in early 1993 for NVI. In the Association of Professional Engineers of Ontario Competition he grabbed first place for NVI last spring. LaPierre won $1,500 in the two competitions.

Interest and interviews followed. LaPierre was interviewed by CHRO, the Ottawa Citizen, and CBC Radio's As It Happens. He was also contacted by companies looking to market his device.

"He's gotten more publicity out of that project than any other student I've had," says Knight. "He's marketed himself very well."

Visuaid 2000, a firm that develops equipment for the handicapped in Canada, had already been thinking about developing a device like NVI.

LaPierre provided the answer. "It was a matter of perfect timing," says LaPierre.

Visuaid 2000 hired LaPierre last summer to test the feasibility of NVI. The Montreal-based firm was given $200,000 by Communications Canada for this and similar projects.

A California company, Arkenstone, is currently interested in manufacturing NVI. LaPierre says Arkenstone has mentioned that it would like to market some form of NVI as early as March.

But LaPierre says the version Arkenstone is thinking of putting out is not the best possible form.

"There is still room for improvement. For example, NVI now weighs about 10 pounds. I think I could get it down to Walkman size," LaPierre says. "Also, it currently only tells you where you are but not how to get where you are going. Finally, there is the problem of blocked transmission when bridges and skyscrapers are in the way." □

Nitrogen research unites Carleton and Havana

by John Kirkham
Charlatan Staff

What do nitrogen, bacteria and sugar cane have in common?

For that matter, what does all this have to do with the University of Havana, Cuba?

Well to start, the element nitrogen is a fundamental component of proteins, which are essential to all life. The plants that we eat, such as sugar cane, require this nitrogen to grow. In agriculture, nitrogen is added to the soil in the form of fertilizer.

Nitrogen gas (N₂) makes up about 80 per cent of the earth's atmosphere, so why do you need to fertilize soil? Despite this abundance of atmospheric nitrogen gas, most living things can't use it in this form. In order for plants to utilize this essential element, it must first be fixed by certain bacteria.

The process of nitrogen fixation is the conversion of nitrogen gas into more biologically useful compounds such as nitrate and ammonium, which can be absorbed by plants.

There are many types of nitrogen-fixing bacteria that naturally occur in the soil, but none that can account for the growth, year after year without fertilizer, discovered in some crops of Cuban sugar cane. Similar crops were found in Brazil, where in 1988, the bacteria responsible for this high rate of N₂ fixation was first identified by Brazilian researchers as acetobacter diazotroph.

Further Cuban research led to the conclusion that this bacteria must live inside the sugar cane, rather than the soil; however, neither the Cubans nor the Brazilians knew what part of the plant it grew in.

In research that has been ongoing at Carleton in conjunction with the University of Havana, Zhongmin Dong, a PhD student in Carleton's biology department, has recently found where they live. "They live in the intercellular spaces of the sugar cane plant," says Dong. "That is, the tiny gaps between cells which contain a very high sugar concentration."

These intercellular spaces contain a high concentration of sugar in liquid form, which has been shown in the lab to be ideal for the growth of this bacteria. Using facilities at Queen's University in the lab of Dr. Layzell, a world expert in nitrogen fixation, further research conducted by Dong has measured the rate of nitrogen fixation by acetobacter diazotroph under normal atmospheric conditions.

Sugar cane: good with berries, Cornflakes and milk

Unlike most common nitrogen-fixing bacteria which require very specialized growing conditions such as low concentrations of oxygen, acetobacter diazotroph has fewer environmental restrictions. It needs only a high concentration of sugar and will fix nitrogen in normal atmospheric concentrations of oxygen. In fact, even if nitrogen fertilizer is added to the soil it will continue to fix nitrogen, whereas other species of bacteria would stop this fixation.

Other experiments have shown that this bacteria can be introduced into sweet potato and sweet sorghum crops with the same beneficial results. In fact, it is believed that this bacteria could be introduced into any crop with a sufficiently high sugar content. The next step will be to discover a way of either raising the sugar content in other crop plants or lowering the sugar concentration required by the bacteria.

So what does this mean? It means that plants with this bacteria growing in it will not need nitrogen fertilizer added, saving on labor and fertilizer costs and preventing the depletion of soils. For Cuba, sugar cane is one of their major exports.

"Knowing about this bacteria and how it works is of great importance to their economy. For the University of Havana, which has been working in conjunction with Carleton on this research project, this means positive international exposure and increased funding for the work they are doing," says Michelle Watt, a Carleton graduate student in biology who has been involved in a Carleton-Havana exchange program.

Future research into this bacteria may mean going into the field in Cuba to make measurements of the bacteria's nitrogen fixation, as well as bringing an exchange student from University of Havana to Carleton.

"An exchange student, Domingo Mesa, will be coming for three months beginning this January. He will come to work in the lab on the sugar cane project with Zhongmin and others here at Carleton," says Dr. Margaret McCully, head of Carleton's plant structure and function lab. This will be a part of the ongoing exchange program between Carleton and the University of Havana. □

Don't forget to remember

Once upon a time, not so long ago, there was a day called Remembrance Day. It was a day filled with reflection and contemplation. Memories of the past and of those who have died as a result of war were the focus of reflection.

What they had fought for, whether good or bad, was irrelevant. Schools closed and lessons were postponed to provide a time for reflection upon war and the great loss of human life it causes. Today, however, there exists an atmosphere of apathy towards this event and towards the issues it is meant to address.

Seldom do you see, at 11 o'clock on Nov. 11, anyone stopping what they are doing to sit in contemplation. What we must remember is the wars which took place in the present century and the issues raised by them are just as prevalent now as ever.

This is not to say there aren't other issues that deserve attention, but there is a time and a place for other issues to be addressed. Nov. 11, however, is not the time or place. It has been set aside from every other day of the year for one purpose, and one purpose only -- the remembrance of those who gave their lives not only for our country, but for their families and many other countries around the world.

Since there seems to be very little recognition of this day by the university, the onus is on the individual to mark the day with personal remembrance.

But the students of today don't seem to remember the pain and suffering those who came before them experienced during times of war. They don't see the connection between that and the freedom they now possess.

They can go downtown and see the veterans on parade, but this means nothing if you don't know who these men and women are. If people cared to spend the time, they would find these old men and women have much to tell, both good things and bad -- the anguish war causes and the joys it can bring through the friendships it fosters.

Tales about these times can be beneficial for us all, but even if you never get the chance to hear them told firsthand, it is still important to know and understand what went on. We must remember these people who died for us had families and friends before going to war. Many of their lives ended abruptly, far away from home.

But Remembrance Day is not just about fighting. It is about the love those soldiers showed for their country and their people. A love strong enough to allow them to put their lives on the line, to aid and protect others whom they didn't even know.

To allow people to forget the true reason for Remembrance Day is to allow them to forget the reason that our country is at peace today and why they are allowed to live the life they do.

There are many students walking through the hallways with blood red poppies pinned to their chests, but do they know what those pins represent or why they're worn?

Rarely now do you hear the poem "In Flanders Fields." Its meaning and words, which encompass the spirit of the day, are forgotten by many and remembered by few. How many of us can truly say that we remember all the lines of something that, at one time, was drilled into our heads so that we might always remember? And yet, we have forgotten.

Are we so disinterested in our past and the lessons it tries to teach us? Many have said history repeats itself, especially when its lessons are left untaught to following generations. If we don't make a conscious effort to learn from the past, many of the atrocities committed by humanity may be repeated.

But, there is an unwillingness to learn that has frustrated those willing to teach, and so, many have given up trying. This is unfortunate, for those best able to educate us are now few in number, old age having claimed many of the wars did not.

In a few years, much of the valuable information these men and women could have imparted will be lost forever. Will they too pass from our memories, forgotten, not remembered?

It comes down to this -- it does not matter what you remember, whether it be a relative who gave his or her life for others, or the horrors of war that took place during this century. What is important is that at some point on Remembrance Day, you simply take the time to remember.

War toys out, play with peace!

by Richard Sanders

Richard Sanders is the co-ordinator of the Coalition to Oppose the Arms Trade

One of the more ironic things about the spirit surrounding the Christmas season is that department and toy stores take on the appearance of miniature weapons bazaars.

These plastic arms markets flog everything from toy swords, pistols and automatic weapons to ersatz missiles, tanks and jet bombers. There's even a board game that involves the massacre of hundreds of thousands of people in Iraq.

One has to wonder what effect this form of play must be having upon children, whose attitudes about the world are in the formative stage. War toys, violent video games and television programs are a dominant feature of children's play. This can only have a negative impact on the psychological and social programming of today's children.

New Ontario Ministry of Education guidelines say that, by the end of Grade 9, children should "show a commitment to peace, social justice and the protection of the environment in their own community, Canada and the world." To meet this recommendation, teachers must compete with the powerful tide of violent culture and entertainment which is influencing children outside the classroom.

It is disturbing to note that the average child in Canada spends less time each week in school than they do with television, the one-eyed babysitter. According to a 1993 study in TV Guide, children's cartoons are the most violent form of programming on TV. Cartoons bombard children with images of 26 violent acts per hour.

The Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission, in a 1991 study said, "a large majority of studies record a positive association between exposure to television violence and aggressive and antisocial behavior.... As a whole, the literature gives little comfort to those who assert... that violence on television does not influence behavior."

What do these violent programs and toys teach children about interpersonal and global relations? First of all, kids these days are being trained to accept violence as the preferred means of resolving conflicts. War toys and violent games also have other ugly sides. They often promote racist and sexist attitudes. For example, in some video games and action figures, the "bad guy" is often depicted as a dark-skinned warrior.

War toys also condition children to associate extreme violence with fun, pleasure and other positive emotions. The combination of these influences on children and youth is extremely dangerous and should be countered with an effort to promote positive toys and games.

In an attempt to mobilize opposition to war toys and to foster support for peaceful toys and games, the Coalition to Oppose the Arms Trade initiated the formation of a new alliance of individuals and groups this autumn. The result was the creation of the Network for Non-Violent Play whose goal is to promote creative, non-violent toys, games and entertainment for children as alternatives to toy weapons, violent media games and action figures.

There are places that offer peaceful alternatives. Family Pastimes, a Perth toy company, makes co-operative games. Also, Mrs. Tiggy Winkle's is an Ottawa toy store that doesn't sell violent toys.

In addition, the network encourages people to:

- boycott violent toys and buy only peaceful playthings

- talk to your younger brothers, sisters, nephews, nieces and children about the reasons why violent toys are undesirable

- write to your MPs to ask for legislation banning violent toys

- make your views about violent toys known to store managers and toy manufacturers

One of the main dangers of war toys and violent games is that they will desensitize children to the real wars and violence raging around them in the world. This is why it's important to counteract the influence of these toys by promoting the peaceful alternatives. □

Frats with no B.S.

Editor:

Frat boys -- are they the sexist, elitist, homophobic alcoholics that lots of people think they are?

Well, it would be an injustice to the Greek-lettered community if I spoke on their behalf, so I will only relate to you the experience that I have had as a Beta Theta Pi.

No, we are not sexist; we just don't let women in.

No, we are not elitist; we just don't have time for anybody else.

No, we are not homophobic; we just like women.

And no, we are not alcoholics; it's just coincidence that we have the best A & B boating teams (drinking contests) this side of Ontario, three years running.

So, this is an honest look at my fraternity, without the B.S.

Re: "Courses have non-Western content," The Charlatan, Nov. 4, 1993.

While it is encouraging that the department of political science offers courses on non-Western topics, I think the fact that compulsory course, 47.230 History of Political Thought, deals only with Western thought is a valid concern.

Indeed, it is the reluctance of many university departments across North America to modify their political thought courses to include non-Western perspectives that helped spark the political correctness debates in the first place.

Offering other, albeit optional, courses on non-Western subjects is fine. The issue, however, is whether an academic department should consider including non-Western political thought in an Eurocentric compulsory course entitled "History of Political Thought."

Not all men rape

Editor:

The peer educators of the Date Rape Prevention Campaign would like to address the assertion made by Robert K. Kisielewski, founding member of the local Sigma Pi fraternity, that the date rape prevention video "portrayed fraternity members as rapists." ("Fraternities myth and reality," The Charlatan, Oct. 21, 1993).

What is portrayed in the video is a young man who rapes a woman during a party. Not all of the men at the party rape a woman; only one man rapes a woman. In addition, one of the fraternity members is portrayed as the male "voice of reason," and accurately identifies his friend's behavior as rape and provides a positive role model for viewers.

It would be naive of us not to take seriously the research conducted in the U.S. regarding sexual assault on campus. While the following research was conducted in the United States, the university and college atmospheres in Canada share many characteristics -- one of them being the nature of social activities and organizations.

In "Attitudes and Acts of Sexual Aggression on a University Campus," Sociological Inquiry, J. Garrett-Gooding and R. Senter show that 35 per cent of fraternity men, 11 per cent of men from other organizations and 9 per cent of men from student government organizations have reported having forced someone to have sexual intercourse.

Gang rape statistics are even more alarming: documented cases of alleged gang rape by college students from 1980-1990 show that 55 per cent were committed by fraternity members, 40 per cent by members of sports teams and 5 per cent by men who were not affiliated with any formal organization, according to Fraternity and Gang Rape by C.R. Swanson and N.C. Territo.

We are not stating that all fraternity members are rapists, just as we believe that not all men are rapists. What we are asserting is that male-only organizations need to address the issues of date rape and violence against women.

From us to you: A letter to our readers

by Mo Gannon

Charlatan '518

We have a funny kind of relationship. The love-hate sort of thing.

No one said a casual weekly relationship would be easy, especially when it's not monogamous. Especially when it's between a paper and thousands of readers.

You think we're too serious or we're too juvenile. You think we're too sensitive or not sensitive enough. You think we complain too much or we don't know how to take a stand.

That's what you told us at The Charlatan's feedback table last week.

Quite honestly, we thought we'd be heaped with abuse, but quite a few people went out of their way to tell us they had nothing to complain about. But the criticism was constructive and the back-patting was, well, surprising, considering how much fun can be had trashing the media.

So, we've done a lot of thinking about what you had to say and we're trying to figure out where you're coming from.

You hate our rigid style of journalism, our perceived left wing political bias, the objectivity, the "political correctness," the sexism, the negativity, the cheezy humor columns, the typos and spelling errors, the Fun Farquhar Facts, the explicit sex issues, the CUSA coverage and the covers.

You love: our well-written and well-researched articles and analysis, the broad spectrum of issues covered, the blunt and honest criticism, the sense of humor, the Fun Farquhar Facts, the explicit sex issues, the CUSA coverage and the covers.

You want more coverage of positive stuff, international affairs, news, on-campus events, off campus events, sports, music, entertainment, fun stuff, CUSA, administration, student discrimination, feminist awareness and politics.

You want less coverage of serious stuff, news, sports, music, boring stuff, CUSA, Sparky, racism, sexism, homophobia and politics.

So you see our problem, huh?

Maybe we're doing something right if there's enough in the paper for everyone to love and hate.

But it's an iffy line to tread when you're the one deciding what goes into a paper. You want to uncover what's wrong with the way things are and what's right with them too. You want to push the limits of what's acceptable, but you don't want to push them over the edge. You want people to think, but you want to give them a break from thinking. You don't want to entertain or bore people into a coma either way.

No one said trying to define the interests of about 22,000 Carleton students would be easy.

No one said those interests would be hard to figure out because sometimes the only outside contact we have is with the pizza guy, who brings us dinner when we're holed up in the office.

No one said we should stop trying, though. So if you've got something that burns your butt, or we're doing something you can't live through your Thursdays without, let us know. Or get involved. There's a whole bunch of students trying to come up with new things for the paper every week, so a little extra brain power is always welcome.

Like the student body at Carleton, no one at the paper thinks alike and the more divergent views we have to make, our presses turn 'round the better. That way, we can try and make sure there's something for everyone in this little rag we call The Charlatan.

Anyways, what we want to say is we're trying to make this relationship work. So just give us a chance.

carleton's corporate

by Karin Jordan
State Smasher

Corporate investment in universities has some people worried that those who donate top dollar to universities will dictate the bottom line about what gets taught.

Lucy Watson, president of the Carleton University Students' Association, says this is one reason she has seen the face of Carleton change since she first arrived here as a student four years ago.

"It (corporate investment) is on the rise definitely and it's on the rise in huge leaps and bounds." Watson gives the examples of the Minto Building and the Centre for Research in Particle Physics, sponsored by the International Nickel Company, or Inco Ltd. Minto donated $1 million toward the construction of the Minto Building, which was completed in 1992. In 1991, Inco donated $750,000 for the centre, which is currently under construction as an extension to the Herzberg Building.

Watson says she's concerned that investment from the private sector may have strings attached which will affect education at Carleton.

"(Corporate investment) could influence courses that are offered and the content of those courses," says Watson.

She says she also feels corporations may try to influence what doesn't get taught in the classroom. "Corporations could donate to certain courses and then, in exchange for that, will say 'don't mention our name in the textbooks, leave us out of it.' That is a serious concern as well."

The Carleton University Development Corporation was founded by the university in July 1991 to encourage "interaction between the university, local business, industry and government," according to its publicity pamphlet. The corporation is owned by the university and is overseen by university President Robin Farquhar.

The corporation tries to maximize the profitability of Carleton's research projects and real estate, and looks for ways of producing revenues for Carleton University that will help the university expand and enhance its teaching and research role, which is the university's fundamental role," says David Brown, president of the corporation.

Brown says with shrinking federal transfer payments, there is increasing pressure to find alternative sources of revenue for Carleton.

He says Carleton's research and researchers are assets that can be marketed, as is Carleton's property.

One way to make money for the university is by selling "intellectual property," says Brown. He says CUDC works at "assisting organizations, particularly private sector organizations, to find ways of working with the university in areas of research."

Brown says if a researcher at Carleton develops a product which interests a corporation, the corporation will pay for the product either by buying it outright or paying royalties over a longer period of time.

For example, Carleton Energy Services Inc., which is owned by CUDC, has sold the design for Carleton's ground water heating and cooling system to at least two customers. Brown says the project brought in about $40,000 in total sales last year and will bring in about $60,000 this year. He says he expects Carleton Energy Services' gross sales to grow to $250,000 over the next few years. Brown says the profits are between 10 and 15 per cent of the gross sales and go to the university.

CUDC is also building a technology and training centre on the parking lot by the athletics building. The centre will cost between $6 and $7 million to build and will be completed in 1994, says Drew Love, CUDC's vice-president of development. He says the building was financed through a developer, Bultcon Ltd. of Toronto. CUDC is now paying the developer back over a 35-year period.

The building will have offices and labs for businesses doing research with Carleton. The building will also have training facilities for management and "professional development" courses offered by the Carleton's school of continuing education, which is run by CUDC.

Brown describes the centre as an "incubator" for small businesses, where entrepreneurs can find support for developing their ideas and technology to sell. The businesses can draw on Carleton professors, lab facilities and library resources.

Brown says bringing businesses onto campus also gives science and engineering students and professors exposure to companies working in their areas of interest.

Brown says some larger companies are interested in making use of the new centre, but says he cannot disclose which companies are involved because negotiations have not been completed. He adds that the humanities do not get as much direct benefit from the programs CUDC works on.

"The humanities have more difficulty integrating into this kind of program, but it's not impossible," he says.

Love is quick to emphasize that CUDC does not solicit direct corporate sponsorship of research. "By having a company come in and lease space in this building is not a direct association to that company funding research activities. What it does do is, it's the intermediate step to encourage those companies to then decide that they will develop or expand their current relationship with Carleton University," he says.

Brown says CUDC does not screen the corporations which will use the centre or their projects. "That's not our responsibility," he says.

Carleton's alumni and development office, which handles direct private donations to the university, also has no policy to screen private donors.

"You write us a cheque, we'll take it basically," says Kenzie Thompson, an associate director at Carleton's development and alumni services office.

"It's a hard go out there in terms of trying to raise charitable dollars. So no, we don't really screen," says Thompson.

But there are ethical debates surrounding some corporate donors.

Two years ago, the Carleton Anti-Apartheid Action Group unsuccessfully challenged a $25,000 donation to the Challenge Fund made by Shell Canada, because the company had investments in South Africa.

Jamie Swift, the author of The Big Nickel, Inco at Home and Abroad, says Inco has done business with repressive military regimes in Guatemala and Indonesia, and has a poor environmental record both in Canada and abroad.

"It seems to me the situation at universities is that they're so desperate for funds, they'll go anywhere cap in hand to any corporation," says Swift.

But Thompson says the university will not accept donations with strings attached. She says if, for example, a company donated money to a specific department and then tried to stipulate who would chair the department, "we'd have to say no."

A requirement of charitable status is that there is no direct financial benefit for the donor, says Donna DuBreuil, another associate director at development and alumni services.

"We've gone well beyond the letter of the law in this department in making sure that there could be no speculation that there is any benefit which accrues to the individual donor," says DuBreuil. But others say the influence of corporate sponsorship on education is far more subtle and wide-reaching.

"Businesses are trying to make universities a factory to produce workers," says Song Cho, a member of OPIRG-Carleton's anti-racism working group and a fourth-year journalism student.

"You

cheque, we'll take

campus:

Cho says one of the anti-racism working group's goals is to make Carleton's curriculum inclusive of people of color, poor people, women and gay, lesbian and bisexual people. Cho says shrinking government funding makes it difficult for universities to meet this goal, while corporate donors do not have the goal of a more inclusive education either.

"How is women's studies relevant to the interests of business? They want cogs in the machine, they don't want people that want to control that machine or question the system," says Cho. "They want to create a better worker who will eventually become a better consumer and will fit into a capitalist framework. They want something for their money." But students aren't the only ones scrutinizing the role corporations play on campuses. Corporate executives and university officials have a group which looks at ways to increase direct donations from corporations to universities.

The Corporate-Higher Education Forum, founded in 1983, is made up of the presidents of about 30 universities (including Carleton President Robin Ferguson) and about 40 executives of corporations such as Shell Canada Ltd., Bell Canada, Dow Chemical Canada Inc., and Alcan Aluminum Ltd. The forum's goals, according to a 1984 forum publication called Partnership for Growth, are to develop closer links between universities and corporations.

"Corporate-academic collaboration helps to optimize the use of Canada's limited human, financial and physical resources in education while tuning the research effort and the university curriculum more closely to the needs of the marketplace," the report says.

York University professor Howard Buchbinder is critical of turning knowledge into a commodity that can be bought and sold. He argues that learning has been turned into something which is pursued for profit, not for its own sake.

In an interview with This Magazine, he said higher education has been "perverted" by corporate investment and influence.

"At the heart of this perversion is the idea that knowledge doesn't belong to society, that you can quantify it, produce it for a particular company, then package it and put a price on it," he told This Magazine.

Rob Shields, a professor of sociology and anthropology at Carleton, says universities faced with shrinking transfer payments are forced to streamline and "rationalize" departments.

The defining feature of universities and research is asking questions which challenge the system, says Shields. But he says this is vanishing from universities.

"All this is driven by administrative problems. And the solutions are administrative. It's not about research, or intellectual freedom, or the ability to inquire."

The Corporate-Higher Education Forum report From Patrons to Partners, Corporate Support for Universities, published in 1987, assures universities that "the priorities of the supporting corporations will be integrated with the priorities of the universities."

The report also says that donations will depend on what the businesses get in return. "Significant support will not be forthcoming unless these businesses see the university's activities as relevant to their needs," it reads.

The report lists the benefits for corporations of investing in post-secondary education as "more productive university-educated employees, access to and acquisition of new and potentially profitable ideas through transfer of technology and the availability of a cost-effective extension of the corporation's research and development arm."

In an article in the journal Interchange, Buchbinder and York University professor Jane Newson write that words used in the corporate discourse surrounding investment such as "partnership," or "bridging the gap," are used to "disguise a situation in which the academic community is being forced to abandon its advocacy of certain principles and procedures once thought to be at the heart of the academic enterprise."

As government funding of post-secondary education decreases, universities are increasingly being forced to compromise their academic independence for the needs of corporations, write Buchbinder and co-author Newson.

Shields says streamlining university programs means students get pigeonholed into rigidly defined, career-oriented programs.

"It shows up in programs that have fewer optional branches, so everyone takes the same courses," he says.

"The bureaucratic and the technocratic university is a university which prepares students only for predefined slots in a system of social elites."

As lecture halls become overcrowded and the number of students a professor is responsible for increases, the opportunities to ask questions get narrower, says Shields.

"People are fed information rather than given the opportunity to discover," he says.

At the University of Toronto, about 80 per cent of private sector investment has gone into technological or bureaucratic fields, says David Robbins, a board member of OPIRG-Toronto. This has had a profound impact on the university, turning it into a "skills factory," he says.

Cho says he sees a low level of corporate support for the humanities compared to the amount of money given to science programs.

"Our world doesn't need more engineers and scientists. It needs more critical and creative thinkers," he says.

Watson says she feels there is a technological emphasis where corporations place their money.

"I have concerns with corporations starting to dictate what is offered," says Watson. "I don't know of Bell sponsoring an English course."

"You don't win status for funding poets," says Shields.

But Thompson argues there is a charitable side to corporate funding of post-secondary education.

"To a large extent, universities are educating the human resources that corporations are using. So there is very much a belief in giving to education because it's to the benefit of the corporation," she says.

Watson says students and faculty need to hold university administrators accountable for the donations Carleton accepts.

She also says students should lobby to increase public funding to universities. Presently, federal transfer payments to the provinces are a lump sum, with no amount specified for post-secondary education.

"We need to make sure that transfer payments are allocated directly to post-secondary education rather than going to build a road when people are sitting on cement stairs in classrooms," says Watson.

But Swift says he thinks corporate investment in education will continue to grow.

"It's part of a trend that's been going on for a long time. The voices of corporations are becoming louder as the state withdraws funding from the university. And whatever weight the corporations have had will only get greater," says Swift.

Cho says students and faculty need to discuss what sort of education they want and what they think the role of corporations in education should be.

"Do we just want corporate training grounds, or do we want a place where creativity and critical thinking can be fostered?" asks Cho.

"We have to make our voices heard. It shouldn't just be businesses setting the agenda." □
